PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT

Petitioner General Motors Corporation ("GM") prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment herein of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Court of Appeals en banc (App. B, infra) is not yet reported. The panel opinion of the Court of Appeals (App. C, infra) is reported at 573 F.2d 936. No memorandum opinion of the District Court was issued. The reporter's transcript of proceedings of the District Court on June 28, 1977 (App. D, infra) contains the District Court's oral opinion.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on September 7, 1978. This petition for certiorari was filed on November 3, 1978. Such filing was timely whether the applicable period is the 90 days prescribed by 28 U.S.C. § 2101(c) or the 30 days prescribed by Supreme Court Rule 22(2), since the latter period was extended until November 6, 1978, by order of Mr. Justice Stewart entered on September 27, 1978. This Court's jurisdiction is invoked pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether an attorney employed by the Internal Revenue Service with substantial prior agency involvement in a tax matter should be permitted to conduct a grand jury investigation of the same matter.

2. Whether a court of appeals lacks jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) to accept an interlocutory appeal of an order allowing such IRS lawyer to conduct this grand jury investigation when the appeal is certified by a district court and the grand jury proceeding is not stayed while the appeal is pending.

3. Whether an order denying a motion to disqualify counsel in a grand jury proceeding may be appealed under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 or reviewed under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651.

STATEMENT

During the audit in 1975 of GM's 1972 federal income tax return, GM agreed at the request of the IRS to conduct a survey to produce an estimate of the amount of expense materials (such as supplies, tools and machinery repair parts) which were on hand and unused but not reported in an inventory account. When the results of the survey indicated a lower amount than expected by the Revenue Agents, the agents began a series of visits to GM plants. These visits were punctuated by singularly abusive tactics and improper behavior on the part of some of the agents, such as berating GM employees who helped conduct the survey, refusing to listen to or accept good faith explanations by GM employees, and openly accusing GM employees of bad faith and of falsifying the survey.[1] In July 1976, shortly after GM protested these practices, the Revenue Agents broke off all contact with GM and referred the matter to the Intelligence Division of the IRS, which conducts joint civil and criminal tax investigations.

1. Representative examples of these abuses were presented to the District Director and the Regional Commissioner of the IRS, then to the District Court, in the form of 23 affidavits signed by various GM employees. The affidavits are part of the record in this case. To date the IRS has never fully investigated the allegations of misconduct.

The Intelligence Division never conducted an investigation using the statutory powers which are available to it. Instead, in December 1976, Meno W. Piliaris, an attorney employed by the Office of Regional Counsel of the IRS, which had the responsibility for legal advice to the IRS with respect to GM tax matters, prepared a letter to the Department of Justice recommending that a grand jury investigation of GM and its employees be instituted. In that letter Mr. Piliaris stated the intention of the IRS to obtain the grand jury information for civil purposes:

> At the appropriate time we will request that an order be sought from the Court authorizing the disclosure of grand jury information to IRS under the provisions of Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. [App. D-7.]

The Department of Justice accepted the referral. GM subsequently learned that the referral to the Department by the IRS was pursuant to a provision of the Internal Revenue Manual, Section 9267.4, which described extensive IRS participation in investigative (as opposed to accusatory) grand jury proceedings.

In April 1977, Special Agents of the IRS served numerous grand jury subpoenas on GM and GM employees. Believing that the Section 9267.4 grand jury procedure was illegal because it gave excessive control over the grand jury to the IRS and did not sufficiently insulate grand jury information from civil use, GM filed motions to quash and for a protective order. The government's brief in opposition described the procedures which the government proposed to use in conducting the investigation, and revealed that Mr. Piliaris, the IRS attorney who had prepared the referral recommendation to the Department of Justice, would be present in the grand jury room to question the witnesses called before the grand jury. In fact, the letter from the Justice Department authorizing Mr. Piliaris to conduct the grand jury proceedings described him as "an attorney for the Government employed full time by Chief Counsel, Internal Revenue Service" [App. G-1]. Since Mr. Piliaris' presence in the grand jury room violated Rule 6(d) and accentuated what GM believed to be improper IRS influence on the grand jury proceeding, GM filed a further motion seeking an order prohibiting Mr. Piliaris from participating.

The District Court held an in camera hearing from which GM counsel were excluded, at which the government made an ex parte presentation. Formal argument was then held in open court. On June 28, 1977, the court delivered an oral opinion (App. D, infra) in which the court ruled that administrative review of grand jury materials by IRS officials for the purpose of deciding whether to recommend prosecution was contrary to Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as it then stood, but that participation in the investigation by the Special Agents and participation by Mr. Piliaris in the grand jury sessions were permissible. The court issued three orders which inter alia denied GM's motion regarding Mr. Piliaris. GM filed a notice of appeal and sought a stay pending appeal, which was denied by the District Court and by Circuit Judge Engel.

On July 6, 1977, the grand jury began hearing testimony from GM employees and other witnesses, and the grand jury continued calling witnesses and receiving GM documents until April 5, 1978. Mr. Piliaris participated actively in these proceedings.

Meanwhile, on August 23, 1977, the District Court granted GM's request to certify its June 30 order regarding Mr. Piliaris pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (App. E, infra). GM filed a timely petition for permission to appeal in the Sixth Circuit, which the Sixth Circuit granted (App.

F, infra) on October 3, 1977.[2] On April 5, 1978, a panel of that court, one judge dissenting, reversed the judgment of the District Court, holding that the participation of Mr. Piliaris in the grand jury proceedings invalidated the grand jury (App. C, infra).

The government voluntarily suspended the grand jury proceedings upon receiving the panel decision[3] and filed a timely petition for rehearing en banc. The District Court entered an order, as agreed by GM and the government, impounding the grand jury documents and transcripts until completion of all appellate reviews. The petition for rehearing was granted. On September 7, 1978, the Sixth Circuit en banc dismissed the appeal, holding that "The District Court's order is not reviewable under the Interlocutory Appeals Act of 1958" and that the order

2. The government filed a motion to dismiss GM's appeal of right pursuant to § 1291, and opposed GM's petition for permission to appeal pursuant to § 1292(b). The Sixth Circuit decided to accept the appeal under § 1292(b) and dismissed the § 1291 appeal. See App. F, infra.

3. The grand jury proceedings were never halted, suspended, delayed, or otherwise hindered during the pendency of GM's appeal. No court stayed the grand jury proceedings. Over 100 GM employees testified before the grand jury, and GM produced many thousands of documents to the grand jury in response to over 160 subpoenas duces tecum. Only after the Sixth Circuit panel ruled the grand jury proceedings invalid did the government voluntarily suspend the investigation. In subsequently vacating the panel decision and dismissing GM's appeal, the en banc majority apparently overlooked the facts of this case, ruling that an appeal should not be allowed because of a policy against delaying grand jury proceedings.

likewise could not be appealed under 28 U.S.C. § 1291.[4] There were two dissenting opinions and one concurring opinion. The term of the grand jury expired on October 18, 1978.[5]

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

GM's appeal to the Sixth Circuit raised an important question concerning the interpretation of the Criminal Rules promulgated by this Court and the fair and proper administration of criminal justice: Can an attorney employed by the IRS with substantial responsibility within his agency for a tax matter be permitted to conduct a grand jury investigation of the taxpayer and its employees? This practice raises such significant problems of fundamental fairness, conflict of interest, abuse of process, and grand jury secrecy that it should be reviewed under the supervisory responsibilities of this Court. Circuit Judge Weick described this issue as creating "one of the most important cases ever to be presented to an appellate court for review." (App. B-14). The District Court certified the issue as "a controlling question of law as to which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion" while the grand jury continued, and the panel of the Sixth Circuit exercised its supervisory responsibility in deciding the substantive issue.

4. When the Sixth Circuit panel dismissed GM's § 1291 appeal, GM could not at that time seek certiorari to review the order dismissing its § 1291 appeal on the Piliaris issue, since the simultaneous granting of GM's § 1292(b) appeal rendered that § 1291 question moot. The extraordinary action by the Sixth Circuit of overruling the panel decision of October 3, 1977 to accept the § 1292(b) appeal should not be construed to leave GM unable to obtain review in this Court of the Sixth Circuit's dismissal of GM's § 1291 appeal.

5. The expiration of the grand jury term has not rendered the case moot because the transcripts of testimony taken while Mr. Piliaris was present in the grand jury room have not been destroyed and the government has stated that the investigation is not yet complete. Thus GM has a continuing interest "more substantial than a naked desire for vindication." 13 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3533, p. 263; cf. United States v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794, 797 (5th Cir. 1975).

In vacating the panel decision and dismissing the appeal for lack of jurisdiction, the majority of the Sixth Circuit en banc adopted an unduly narrow construction of a remedial jurisdictional statute, adopted a construction of § 1291 which conflicts with many decided cases, and left standing by appellate default a grand jury practice which is likely to become prevalent if it is not promptly invalidated.[6]

I. The Holding Below, That Interlocutory Appeals Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) Cannot Be Taken from Orders Relating to Grand Jury Investigations, Is Contrary to All Decided Cases in Point and to the Remedial Purpose of the Statute.

The Sixth Circuit en banc majority, without even mentioning the prior case law adverse to its position, concluded that GM's appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) must be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction because a proceeding on a motion involving an aspect of a grand jury investigation is not a "civil action" (App. B-4).

[6] Although the Sixth Circuit en banc decided only the jurisdictional question, which would make appropriate a remand upon reversal, this Court may choose to act upon this petition by also reaching the question raised in GM's appeal to the Sixth Circuit, in the exercise of this Court's supervisory powers. In fact, two judges concurring in the majority decision filed an opinion expressing their views on the substantive question, and two dissenting judges expressed their views on the substantive question in the prior panel decision and in Judge Weick's dissent.

This unprecedented holding, which was reached despite certification by the District Court, acceptance of the § 1292(b) appeal by a panel of the Sixth Circuit, and decision on the merits by another Sixth Circuit panel, conflicts with the Third Circuit's acceptance of such an appeal in In re Grand Jury Impaneled Jan. 21, 1975, 541 F.2d 373 (3d Cir. 1976), as well as with the certification of such an appeal in In re Grand Jury Investigation, 338 F. Supp. 1379 (W.D. Pa. 1972). Moreover, the Second Circuit, in In re Grand Jury Subpoena Served on John Doe, 546 F.2d 498, 501-02 (2d Cir. 1976), and the First Circuit in In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 580 F.2d 13, 17 (1st Cir. 1978), clearly indicated that § 1292(b) appeals are available from orders relating to grand jury investigations. The majority below also ignored two prior Sixth Circuit decisions that are plainly inconsistent with its conclusion.[7] By contrast, no decided case agrees with the decision below.

The Sixth Circuit majority referred to the general policy against interlocutory appeals in criminal cases in support of its restrictive interpretation of § 1292(b). The Sixth Circuit's view that this is a criminal case (and is thus not appealable) cannot be reconciled with this Court's constitutional decisions that a criminal action does not commence until arrest or the filing of an information or indictment.

[7] United States v. Neiberger, 460 F.2d 290, 292 (6th Cir. 1972); United States v. Calandra, 455 F.2d 750, 752-53 (6th Cir. 1972), rev'd on other grounds, 414 U.S. 338 (1974). In these cases the government argued that grand jury proceedings are not criminal cases, and that therefore the limitations on the government's right to appeal in criminal cases contained in 18 U.S.C. § 3731, as then in force, did not apply. The Sixth Circuit allowed the government's appeal in both cases. In Neiberger it stated that an order denying the government's application for a grant of immunity to grand jury witnesses was "a final decision in a civil action and, hence, subject to appeal to this court." 460 F.2d at 292.

The first proceeding in a criminal prosecution is arraignment. Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220, 226-27 (1977); United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564 (1976); Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972). The traditional exclusion of counsel from a grand jury room can be reconciled with the Sixth Amendment only on the theory that a grand jury investigation is not a "criminal prosecution." None of the events required to make this case a criminal prosecution has occurred. Indeed, in this investigation no determination has been made by anyone that a criminal prosecution is warranted.

The question whether interlocutory appeals pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) are permitted from orders relating to grand jury investigations is of great importance in the uniform administration of justice in the federal courts. The Internal Revenue Service has recently revised its procedures to expand greatly the occasions on which it will request grand jury investigations in lieu of using its own investigatory powers. See infra, note 21. The Department of Justice has reported to Congress on the growing use of grand juries for criminal tax investigations.[8] This trend toward using grand juries for lengthy investigations in conjunction with administrative agencies emphasizes the need for an appellate safety valve to prevent an erroneous early ruling on a difficult question from later invalidating subsequent years of effort by the parties. District Judge Churchill cited this very consideration in certifying his order for interlocutory appeal (App. E-1).

Except for the decision below, the federal courts have consistently construed the term "civil action" to include everything that is not a criminal prosecution.[9] As a result, § 1292(b) appeals have been allowed, not only in ordinary civil litigation, but also in admiralty[10] and habeas corpus[11] cases – in everything but criminal prosecutions.

8. Testimony of Assistant Attorney General M. Carr Ferguson before Senate Judiciary Committee, reported in BNA Daily Tax Report No. 76, April 19, 1978, at G-8 et seq.

The Sixth Circuit was strongly influenced by its concern that grand jury investigations not be interrupted by appellate proceedings. It plainly overlooked the fact that the grand jury investigation in this case was not stayed during the pendency of the § 1292(b) appeal. Indeed, stays are not automatic by the very terms of the statute, and should be granted in cases arising out of grand jury proceedings only for sufficiently grave cause. Morever, since a § 1292(b) appeal cannot occur without the required certificate from the district judge and grant of permission by the court of appeals, only issues which are truly deserving of interlocutory appellate review can reach the appellate court during the grand jury stage. The three factors – the absence of automatic stay, the requirement of district court certification, and the requirement of court of appeals permission – prevent § 1292(b) appeals from being used to delay the grand jury. Thus the Sixth Circuit's concern is plainly unwarranted.

The clear purpose of Congress in enacting § 1292(b) in 1958 was to provide an exception to the rigid final judgment rule where interlocutory review would be beneficial. The heretofore uniform interpretation of the federal courts accords with that purpose. The purpose is just as applicable to a grand jury proceeding as to an action for damages.[12] The statute was not confined to narrow categories of cases; indeed, Judge John J. Parker, testifying before the House Judiciary Subcommittee, stated that "it is impossible to foresee the various types of cases that might arise."[13] Accordingly, § 1292(b) should be construed to be available in every kind of case in which its stated conditions are met, except those cases which are criminal in the sense contemplated by the Sixth Amendment and the decisions of this Court.

This Court should grant certiorari to resolve the differences between the decision below and the other cases cited supra, p. 9, and to construe authoritatively the remedial scope of § 1292(b).[14]

12. The D.C. Circuit has stated that an immediate appeal is more appropriate in the grand jury context than in the context of an ongoing lawsuit. Community Broadcasting of Boston, Inc. v. F.C.C., 546 F.2d 1022, 1028 n.41 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

14. The Sixth Circuit, after holding that § 1292(b) does not allow interlocutory review of orders relating to grand jury proceedings under any circumstances, stated that "[E]ven if this appeal could be characterized as an appeal in a 'civil action' within the meaning of § 1292(b), we would exercise our statutory discretion by dismissing this appeal . . ." The holding of the Sixth Circuit that there was no jurisdiction makes the reference to discretion essentially dictum. Moreover, it is apparent from the majority opinion that the majority failed to take into account that, as illustrated by this case, § 1292(b) appeals can be heard without any delay or disruption of the grand jury proceedings.

II. The Sixth Circuit's Holding That No Appeal Lay Under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 Conflicts With Settled Law That Orders Relating to Disqualification of Counsel in a Grand Jury Proceeding Are Appealable.

The Sixth Circuit, relying on authorities unrelated to disqualification of counsel, ruled that GM could not appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 from the District Court's order refusing to disqualify Mr. Piliaris because of a conflict of interest. This ruling is inconsistent with the settled rule that orders disqualifying counsel in a grand jury proceeding are immediately appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 1291.[15]

These decisions reflect a general rule,[16] prevailing in eight circuits,[17] that all orders relating to attorney disqualification, whether disqualifying the attorney or allowing him to proceed, are always immediately appealable. The Sixth Circuit itself previously allowed an immediate § 1291 appeal from an order refusing to disqualify counsel. Mela-

Shell Oil Co.*, 566 F.2d 602, 607 (8th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 98 S.Ct. 2235 (1978).

17. The Ninth Circuit apparently does not allow immediate § 1291 appeals, but achieves the same result by reviewing such orders under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651. Cord v. Smith, 338 F.2d 516 (9th Cir. 1964), modified, 370 F.2d 418 (9th Cir. 1966). The District of Columbia Circuit permits appeals from orders disqualifying counsel, but not from orders refusing to disqualify them. Compare In re Investigation Before April 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600 (D.C. Cir. 1976), with Community Broadcasting of Boston, Inc. v. FCC, 546 F.2d 1022 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

med v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 534 F.2d 82 (6th Cir. 1976).

The reasons for the prevailing rule permitting an immediate appeal from an order denying disqualification of counsel are that "the order is collateral to the main proceeding yet has grave consequences to the losing party, and it is fatuous to suppose that review of the final judgment will provide adequate relief." Silver Chrysler Plymouth, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 496 F.2d 800, 805 (2d Cir. 1974).

These reasons are equally applicable to grand jury proceedings. If, as here, the grand jury proceeds with the challenged lawyer actively participating, and an appellate court ultimately decides after trial and conviction that he should have been disqualified, then nullification of years of litigation is extraordinarily inefficient and burdensome, for both the parties and the courts. But if, to avoid that result, the appellate court which eventually determines that the refusal to disqualify was erroneous nevertheless affirms for lack of substantial prejudice, the challenging party has been unfairly treated. This dilemma for the reviewing court years after the motion to disqualify was denied is completely avoided by allowing an immediate appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 to resolve the disqualification issue promptly. Such an appeal is clearly necessary in grand jury cases as well as others.

The fact that here the motion to disqualify was directed at a government lawyer rather than an attorney for a private party should not change the result: the question of appealability clearly should not depend on which lawyer is involved. The government has appealed denial of its disqualification motions; [18] that same right should not be denied to GM or any other private party.

[18] E.g., United States v. Trafficante, 328 F.2d 117 (5th Cir. 1964).

III. The Sixth Circuit's Refusal to Consider Mandamus Was Erroneous.

The Sixth Circuit majority refused to consider mandamus as an alternative method of review solely because District Judge Churchill had not been made a party to the case (App. B-3 fn. 2). However, four of the seven judges comprising the en banc panel believed that the disqualification issue was appropriate for consideration through supervisory mandamus. Two concurring judges stated that "this court could properly consider the case under the all writs statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1651 (1970), as a petition for a writ of mandamus" (App. B-9). Judge Weick, dissenting, stated that "an appellate court has the power to review by mandamus an issue of first impression involving an undecided problem" (App. B-30). Dissenting Judge Celebrezze had earlier joined in the panel opinion holding mandamus available (App. C-7).

The Sixth Circuit's refusal to consider mandamus on technical grounds was plainly unjustified under the circumstances of this case. GM had no reason to apply formally for a writ of mandamus in the Sixth Circuit because that court had accepted its appeal under § 1292(b) and had decided the case on the merits. Moreover, because District Judge Churchill's certification under § 1292(b) demonstrated his belief that the disqualification issue required immediate review, his participation in the Sixth Circuit proceedings would have been a mere formality.

This case warrants review under the concept of supervisory mandamus, developed by this Court in LaBuy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. 249 (1957) and Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104 (1964). The disqualification issue is vital to the proper administration of justice in the federal courts, and it involves an important question of first impression. Supervisory mandamus has been regularly invoked by the federal appellate courts in cases involving criminal trial and grand jury proceedings.[19] Following its dismissal of the § 1291 and § 1292(b) appeals, the Sixth Circuit's refusal to consider supervisory mandamus, solely because of a technical defect, was error.

IV. This Court Should Exercise Its Supervisory Powers to Prevent Encroachment by Administrative Agencies into the Powers and Province of Federal Grand Juries.

The use of an attorney employed by the IRS to conduct a grand jury proceeding which he requested on behalf of the IRS raises important questions concerning the administration of federal criminal justice and the abuse of the grand jury process. Circuit Judge Weick points out in his dissent (App. B-15):

> In the present case the grand jury is not only being used to assist in the administrative inquiry, but also the Special Attorney conducting the grand jury investigation is the attorney for, and is on the payroll of, the aggrieved agency, and the one who recommended the grand jury investigation.

This practice should be condemned before it further expands. First, it is contrary to statute. Second, it seriously erodes the few protective features contained in the grand jury system, including the independence and presumed neutrality of the grand jury panel and the secrecy of grand jury proceedings. Third, it creates a conflict of interest and an appearance of impropriety.

Only Justice Department attorneys may conduct grand jury investigations and criminal litigation. Congress has provided that "except as otherwise provided by law" an Executive department may not employ an attorney "for the conduct of litigation in which the United States, an agency, or employee thereof is a party . . . or for the securing of evidence therefor, but shall refer the matter to the Department of Justice." 5 U.S.C. § 3106. This statute is the present codification of Executive Order No. 6166 (1933), 5 U.S.C.A. § 901 note, which consolidated litigation authority, previously exercised by such agency attorneys as the General Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, under the direct supervision of the Attorney General.

Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(d) permits only Justice Department attorneys to be present in the grand jury room, and Rule 6(e) permits only Justice Department attorneys to have access to grand jury materials and to decide who else may scrutinize grand jury materials. See Rule 54(c), definition of "Attorney for the Government." Every court which has confronted the question whether an attorney employed by an administrative agency is an "attorney for the government" within Rule 6 has concluded that such attorneys are not included. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 309 F.2d 440 (3d Cir. 1962); In re Grand Jury Investigation, 414 F. Supp. 74 (S.D.N.Y. 1976); United States v. Daneals, 370 F. Supp. 1289 (W.D.N.Y. 1974); United States v. General Electric Company, 209 F. Supp. 197 (E.D. Pa. 1962); see also, Capitol Indemnity Corp. v. First Minnesota Construction Co., 405 F. Supp. 929, 933-34 (D. Mass. 1975).

In order to avoid the force of the statutes, rules and court decisions described above, Mr. Piliaris obtained from the Justice Department a letter (App. G-1) designating him a "Special Assistant United States Attorney" while "employed full time by Chief Counsel, Internal Revenue Service." The government contends that 28 U.S.C. §§ 515 and 543 give the Attorney General absolute discretion to place any attorney he chooses in a grand jury room as a prosecutor. GM contends that such a letter does not transform an administrative agency employee with prior responsibility for the same matter in the agency into a prosecutor legally competent to conduct grand jury proceedings.

The IRS has broad investigatory powers. Prior to making an institutional decision to recommend criminal prosecution,[20] the IRS may use its summons power to investigate possible civil and criminal tax offenses, 26 U.S.C. § 7602; United States v. LaSalle National Bank, 98 S.Ct. 2357 (1978), but a taxpayer or employee receiving a summons must be given ten days to respond, 26 U.S.C. § 7605(a), and has a right to be represented by counsel, 5 U.S.C. § 555(a) and to receive or inspect a transcript of his testimony, 5 U.S.C. § 555(b).

In contrast, a witness may be summoned by a grand jury immediately, must enter the grand jury room without counsel, and has no right to receive, review, or correct the transcript of his testimony. He has no right to object to the questions put to him except upon a claim of privilege. A grand jury conducted by an IRS prosecutor gives the IRS both the advantage of conducting its own investigation and the advantage of using the extraordinary in camera proceedings of the grand jury. In oral argument District Judge Churchill asked one of the government attorneys:

> What's stopping the United States Government from using the grand jury as an investigative tool in almost every big tax case?

[20] No recommendation for prosecution has been made by the IRS in this matter.

> MR. FORREST . . . It may well do that because it's a . . .
> THE COURT: Such a useful tool?

The IRS has recently published elaborate "precautions" designed to allow its agents to review grand jury evidence without corrupting the grand jury process or violating grand jury secrecy and independence.[21] The cornerstone of these protections is the requirement that such IRS Agents work only at the request and under the supervision of the "attorney for the government."

Of what value are the statutes, Rules of Criminal Procedure, court decisions and IRS rules that IRS personnel can assist the grand jury only at the request and under the supervision of the attorney for the government if the attorney for the government is an IRS lawyer?

Federal law prohibits the use of grand jury powers by administrative agencies. See In re Stolar, 397 F. Supp. 520, 523 (S.D.N.Y. 1975). This Court has declared that a grand jury may only be used to investigate the possible commission of crimes, and cannot serve a civil purpose. United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677 (1958). The facts in this case demonstrate that, contrary to this settled principle, the IRS saw this grand jury as a tool to obtain information for its own use. Mr. Piliaris, in drafting the letter to the Justice Department seeking the convening of a grand jury, stated:

> At the appropriate time we will request that an order be sought from the Court authorizing the disclosure of grand jury information to IRS under the provisions of Rule 6(e). [App. D-7]

[21] See Grand Jury Matters, Order 3060.1, Office of the Chief Counsel, Internal Revenue Service, June 23, 1978, p. 1; Manual Supplement 9G-85, Internal Revenue Manual, Internal Revenue Service, June 30, 1978. The new rules are extensive, covering 28 pages in the Chief Counsel order and 13 pages in the Internal Revenue Manual.

With numerous IRS agents drafting grand jury subpoenas and studying documents subpoenaed by the grand jury, and with an IRS attorney participating in the decisions on the scope, duration and conduct of the investigation, there is grave danger that this grand jury has or will become an information-gathering tool of the administrative agency.

Because of the secrecy of grand jury proceedings, there is no practical way for a party to ascertain or prove in court in a particular case whether the grand jury is in fact being abused. There is no way to know whether Mr. Piliaris is assisting the Department of Justice lawyers assigned to the case, or is in fact controlling the case. If the procedure claimed by the government in this case to be valid is not disapproved, the IRS or any other administrative agency can have grand juries assigned to its own attorneys for its own purposes, virtually unpoliced.

In addition to breaching grand jury secrecy, this procedure threatens the fundamental fairness of a grand jury proceeding. It is inconsistent with the responsibility of the grand jury to protect the innocent to allow the grand jury investigation to be conducted by the agency attorney who reviewed GM's charges of improper conduct by the employees of the agency and then drafted the referral to the Department of Justice for the grand jury investigation. The courts have consistently held that grand juries may not be conducted by attorneys who have relationships to the matter under investigation which would impair the impartiality of their judgment. E.g., United States v. Braniff Airways, Inc., 428 F. Supp. 579 (W.D. Tex. 1977); People v. Superior Court of Contra Costa County, 137 Cal. Rptr. 476 (Cal. 1977). An attorney may not prosecute a case at the same time as he represents the victim in a civil case arising out of the same facts. E.g., Ganger v. Peyton, 379 F.2d 709 (4th Cir. 1967).

The Code of Professional Responsibility and the American Bar Association Standards Relating to the Prosecution Function establish that an attorney serving in a grand jury room must avoid the "appearance of professional impropriety" and exercise "sound discretion as an administrator of justice." See ABA Canon 9 and Standards 1.1, 1.2, 3.5, 3.6 and 3.9. Congress has recently reflected its concern for conflicts of interest in the Justice Department. See Ethics in Government Act of 1978, § 603 (signed by the President October 26, 1978), adding § 528 to Title 28 as shown infra at A-4. The prosecuting attorney is more than a mere advocate; he is a quasi-judicial officer. Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409 (1976); United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974).

In practice, whether a grand jury returns an indictment depends largely on whether the government prosecutor requests one. The prosecutor has virtually unreviewable discretion as to the evidence he presents and as to his comments on the evidence and the law. Thus, the oft-repeated statement that a prosecutor in a grand jury proceeding must be impartial is not a mere aspirational ideal but is of vital practical importance in view of Judge Churchill's recognition of the prosecutor's grand jury responsibility. The "main line of defense against abuse of the grand jury process," Judge Churchill declared, is "the good conscience and self restraint of the government prosecutors. . . . The more willingly the decision-making process is surrendered or shared with others the less protective will be their self restraint." (App. D-3).

For this reason, Circuit Judge Weick strongly objected to the practical effect of the en banc majority decision:

> Our citizens who are being investigated by a grand jury surely have the right to object to an attorney on the payroll of the victim of the alleged fraud conducting the grand jury proceedings, and this in> justice should be stopped by the courts as soon as the issue is presented, not delayed while the citizens are continuously subjected to this improper treatment. [App. B-34 n.7]

Judge Weick's concern that an IRS attorney will not discharge his duty of impartiality is well justified. The Internal Revenue Service Enforcement Division Manual § 103 (1969) provides:

> Enforcement attorneys must never lose sight of the significance of criminal prosecutions to revenue enforcement. They must be keenly alert to any relaxation in the driving force which must impel these cases toward successful conclusion. [Emphasis added].

In view of such instructions, as well as the inherent tendency of an agency employee to vindicate agency interests, this Court should follow the suggestion of the commentator who urged:

> The final word as to whether or not to ask for an indictment should not rest with the tax assessing and collecting agency. Here is one of the supreme tests of the competency and fairness of the republican form of Government. It should be entirely separated from the strictly financial interest of the Government and should reside solely in the Government's chief law office.

Buck, Federal Tax Litigation and the Tax Division of the Department of Justice, 27 Va. L. Rev. 873, 895 (1941) [emphasis added].

CONCLUSION

Circuit Judge Weick in his dissent appropriately called attention to the current public interest in grand jury reform when he said (App. B-15):

> The activities of Congress, of the ABA, and of other organizations, for grand jury reform, might not have been necessary if the judiciary had performed its rightful function. We should not abdicate our own responsibilities to correct grand jury abuse.

In this case the lower courts have failed to exercise these responsibilities and have established dangerous precedent for the future. Accordingly, this Court should issue a writ of certiorari to review the judgment and opinion of the Sixth Circuit in this case.

MERRITT, Circuit Judge. General Motors appeals under the Interlocutory Appeals Act of 1958, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1970), from an interolcutory order of the District Court refusing to disqualify a government lawyer from participation in grand jury proceedings. We hold that the original certification of this appeal under § 1292(b) by a panel of this Court was improvidently granted, and we therefore dismiss the appeal.

I. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

In February, 1977, the Department of Justice approved the convening of a special federal grand jury in Detroit to investigate possible criminal tax violations by General Motors. On April 15, 1977, the Attorney General appointed an Internal Revenue Service lawyer to assist Justice Department lawyers in conducting the grand jury inquiry. General Motors moved to disqualify the IRS lawyer from participation in the grand jury proceedings on the grounds that public policy considerations and conflict-of-interest principles of the legal profession prohibit such participation by IRS lawyers who have previously participated in a civil tax investigation of the taxpayer.

Finding that the Attorney General's action is specifically authorized by statute, 28 U.S.C. §§ 515, 543 (1970), the District Judge overruled General Motors' motion to disqualify but certified the issue to us under the Interlocutory Appeals Act of 1958, as a "controlling question" – apparently on the ground that, if the District Court's ruling were later found to be erroneous, the presence of an IRS lawyer in the grand jury room might void any indictment returned by the grand jury against General Motors or its officials. General Motors pursued its appeal to this Court under the Interlocutory Appeals Act, and it also appealed under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 (1970), treating the order as a "final decision" for the purposes of review.

The government then moved to dismiss both appeals, the § 1291 appeal on the grounds that the lower court order over-ruling General Motors' motion to disqualify was interlocutory and not final, and the § 1292(b) interlocutory appeal on the grounds that such piecemeal appeals are not allowed in criminal cases. Without oral argument or conference consideration, an administrative panel of this Court, consisting of Judges Weick, Edwards and Celebrezze, entered an order on October 3, 1977, dismissing General Motors' § 1291 appeal (No. 77-1508) but granting General Motors leave to proceed under § 1292(b). A different panel of this Court, consisting of Judges Weick, Celebrezze and Merritt, then heard the § 1292 (b) appeal on the merits and filed an opinion dated April 5, 1978, reported at –– F.2d ––, holding that this court has appellate jurisdiction and that the IRS lawyer should be barred from the grand jury proceedings. Judge Merritt dissented. On motion by the government, we vacated the panel opinion and ordered rehearing en banc under Rule 35 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure and the Rules of this Court.[1]

II. THE ISSUE OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The District Court's order is not reviewable under the Interlocutory Appeals Act of 1958.[2] The Act authorizes an appeal from an interim or non-final decision "in a civil action" upon a certification by the District Judge that his decision raises a

[1] "The effect of the granting of a hearing en banc shall be to vacate the previous opinion and judgment of this court, to stay the mandate and to restore the case on the docket as a pending appeal." Rule 14(a), Rules of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

[2] General Motors argues in the alternative that we should assert appellate jurisdiction by treating this appeal as a petition for writ of mandamus under 28 U.S.C. § 1361 or § 1651 (1970). The Court does not reach or decide this question because General Motors has not applied for a writ of mandamus in this proceeding, and the District Judge has not received notice or had an opportunity to be heard and thus has not been made a litigant on this appeal. For discussion of appellate procedure in mandamus actions, see generally Rule 21, Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure; Will v. Calvert Fire Ins. Co., 98 S.Ct. 2552 (1978); Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104 (1964); Note, Supervisory and Advisory Mandamus Under the All Writs Act, 86 HARV. L. REV. 595 (1973).

"controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion," and that resolution of the issue "may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." The statute in question establishes the right of interlocutory appeal in civil cases, but it extinguishes that right in criminal cases and in other matters which may not be properly characterized as "civil actions." From a simple reading of the statute itself, it seems self-evident that a grand jury investigation of possible criminal tax violations should not be characterized as a "civil action" under § 1292(b) and that we lack jurisdiction under the Interlocutory Appeals Act.

This conclusion is based not simply on a mechanical application of the terms "civil" or "criminal" to the proceedings below but rests also on an established line of precedent disapproving appellate interruption of the grand jury's investigation. In Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323 (1940), the Supreme Court held that a district court's refusal to quash a grand jury subpoena was not appealable as a final order under § 1291. In an opinion suggesting that a grand jury proceeding is part of the criminal process, Justice Frankfurter, writing for the Court, recognized the historic principle of judicial administration "forbidding piecemeal disposition" and "separate review of the component elements" of criminal cases. 309 U.S. at 325. The principle is designed to conserve judicial time and prevent delaying tactics in criminal proceedings. Justice Frankfurther pointed out that the fifth amendment makes the grand jury a necessary part of the criminal process and explained that "[i]t is no less important to safeguard against undue interruption the inquiry instituted by a grand jury than to protect from delay the progress of the trial after an indictment has been found." Id. at 327.

In United States v. Ryan, 402 U.S. 530 (1971), the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed the holding of Cobbledick and the principles on which it is based, observing that a contempt citation for disobeying the subpoena is the only way to obtain review of such a grand jury question in advance of indictment and trial:

> [W]e have consistently held that the necessity for expedition in the administration of the criminal law justifies putting one who seeks to resist the production of desired information to a choice between compliance with a trial court's order to produce prior to any review of that order, and resistance to that order with the concomitant possibility of an adjudication of contempt if his claims are rejected on appeal. 402 U.S. at 532-33.

General Motors has available the same appellate remedies recognized in Ryan. It can raise the disqualification of counsel issue after indictment and conviction, the normal course of review in such cases, or it can refuse to obey grand jury subpoenas on this ground and appeal a contempt citation. These are the usual remedies, and they are adequate.

Justice Frankfurter in Cobbledick and Justice Brennan in Ryan applied these principles of appellate review in order to prevent interlocutory appeals from grand jury activity under § 1291. The Interlocutory Appeals Act, passed eighteen years after the Cobbledick decision, is based on these same principles forbidding piecemeal review of such cases. The Act limits interim review of "a controlling question of law" to civil cases only and, therefore, should not be read to allow interlocutory review of grand jury proceedings.

Even if this appeal could be characterized as an appeal in a "civil action" within the meaning of § 1292(b), we would exercise our statutory discretion by dismissing this appeal since we do not believe that resolution of this issue at this time would "materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." The legislative history of the Interlocutory Appeals Act suggests that interlocutory appeals, even in civil cases, should be "sparingly granted."[3] To allow an appeal when the District Court has refused to disqualify a government lawyer from a grand jury investigation simply disrupts the investigation and creates the possibility that the target of the inquiry – by the threat of delay and protracted legal maneuvering – will exert unwarranted influence in the government's choice of its prosecuting attorney.

General Motors also argues in the alternative that the District Court's order allowing the former IRS lawyer to participate in grand jury proceedings is a "final decision" within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and therefore is appealable as a matter of right. As previously noted, an administrative panel of this Court, consisting of Judges Weick, Edwards and Celebrezze, dismissed General Motors' § 1291 appeal in the same order that certified the § 1292(b) appeal. General Motors did not appeal that dismissal but, as a matter of fairness, we reach the question of appealability under § 1291, since we have not accepted General Motors' appeal under § 1292(b).

In the Cobbledick and Ryan cases, discussed above, both of which were brought under § 1291, the Supreme Court held that District Court orders controlling the issuance of grand jury subpoenas are not final decisions for the purposes of appeal. For the reasons we have already set forth, we believe that the holding and the principles applied in these two cases preclude General Motors' appeal under § 1291 here. We note also that the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed these principles in Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 98 S.Ct. 2454 (1978), holding that a district court's determination that a lawsuit may not be maintained as a class action is not appealable as a final decision under § 1291. The Court based its decision in part on the factors of "potential waste" and delay discussed in the

See also Kraus v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 364 F.2d 919, 922 (6th Cir. 1966) (invoking "exceptional case" standard as criterion to be met under § 1292(b)); Note, Interlocutory Appeals in the Federal Courts Under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), 88 HARV. L. REV. 607, 626-27 (1975) ("[B]ecause the Act is premised on a notion that there should be case-by-case evaluation of efficiency, any universal standard restricting certification seems out of place.")

Cobbledick decision, and quoted approvingly the following excerpt from Justice Frankfurter's opinion in Cobbledick:

> Since the right to a judgment from more than one court is a matter of grace and not a necessary ingredient of justice, Congress from the very beginning has, by forbidding piecemeal disposition on appeal of what for practical purposes is a single controversy, set itself against enfeebling judicial administration. Thereby is avoided the obstruction to just claims that would come from permitting the harrassment and cost of a succession of separate appeals from the various rulings to which a litigation may give rise, from its initiation to entry of judgment. To be effective, judicial administration must not be leaden-footed. Its momentum would be arrested by permitting separate review of the component elements in a unified cause. 309 U.S. at 325.

The Supreme Court repeated the principle disfavoring interlocutory appeals in criminal cases under § 1291 in another decision last term, United States v. MacDonald, 98 S.Ct. 1547 (1978). In a unanimous opinion, the Court held that a criminal defendant may not appeal, before trial, an order denying his motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds. Again quoting language from the Cobbledick opinion, the Court observed that "the rule of finality has particular force in criminal prosecutions because 'encouragement of delay is fatal to the vindication of the criminal law.'" Id. at 1549, quoting 309 U.S. at 325. The Court noted that it had deviated from this settled principle in a limited category of criminal cases, such as bail review and double jeopardy cases, which "involve an asserted right the legal and practical value of which would be destroyed if it were not vindicated before trial." 98 S.Ct. at 1552.

As previously discussed, General Motors can raise the disqualification of counsel issue after indictment and conviction or on appeal from a contempt citation. It is not an issue which is "destroyed" if not "vindicated before trial." In addition, if no indictment is returned but General Motors believes that the government has improperly used the grand jury to obtain evidence for civil law enforcement purposes, it can raise that question by various motions in the civil action, including a motion to suppress the evidence or a motion to dismiss the complaint. These remedies are adequate, and, unlike this appeal, they do not "arrest the momentum of judicial administration" or "encourage delay."

Accordingly, the appeal is dismissed as improvidently granted under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b).

EDWARDS, Circuit Judge, with whom LIVELY, Circuit Judge, joins, concurring. I join Judge Merritt's opinion dismissing this appeal.

This court has reviewed the record of the grand jury proceedings which was fully developed in the District Court. I conclude after that review that we should now dismiss the appeal for which a panel (of which I was a member) granted leave under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1970). This decision represents a judgment that, on the facts developed, we lack appellate jurisdiction of the case and, hence, as my colleagues in the majority conclude, response to the argument on the merits advanced in the dissent would not be called for.

I feel, however, that if in fact a prosecutorial conflict of interest constituting abuse of the grand jury process were shown in the record below, this court could properly consider the case under the all writs statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1651 (1970), as a petition for writ of mandamus. See Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104, 109-12 (1964); LaBuy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. 249, 259-60 (1957); United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297, 301 n. 3 (1972; Comment, The Appealability of Orders Denying Motions for Disqualification of Counsel in the Federal Courts, 45 U. Chi. L. Rev. 450, 476-80 (1978). See also Will v. Calvert Fire Ins. Co., 46 U.S.L.W. 4811 (U.S. June 23, 1978). Thus, I not only join the opinion of the court in dismissing the appeal, but also consider and reject mandamus as inappropriate on the facts shown in this record.

There is no inherent conflict of interest in the appointment of a federal attorney assigned to the Internal Revenue Service to assist in or conduct a criminal tax investigation through grand jury proceedings. Further, the record made in the District Court shows no abuse of the grand jury process.

The interest of the United States in collection of income taxes is represented both by statutorily authorized civil tax collection proceedings, see 26 U.S.C. §§ 7401-7408 (1976) and (in appropriate cases) criminal fraud prosecutions, see id. §§ 7201-7216. These functions are not in conflict and, on the contrary, the latter supplements the former. In a very recent case this principle has been recognized by the Supreme Court. United States v. LaSalle National Bank, 46 U.S.L.W. 4713, 4716-17 & n. 12 (U.S. June 19, 1978). On this point the LaSalle Court appears to be unanimous. See id. at 4719 & n. 2 (Stewart, J., dissenting).

Congress has specifically authorized the appointment by the Attorney General of special assistants to "conduct any kind of legal proceeding, . . . including grand jury proceedings. . . ." 28 U.S.C. § 515 (1970). This statute requires that each such special assistant "shall take the oath required by law" of assistants to the Attorney General. This was done.

As found by the panel majority in this case (prior to this en banc hearing):

> Nothing precluding such an appointment is found in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Rule 6(d) of Fed.R.Crim.P. provides that "attorneys for the government" may be present during grand jury sessions. Rule 54(c) defines attorneys for the government as including "the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States Attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States Attorney . . . ."
> In re April 1977 Grand Jury Subpoenas, 573 F.2d 936, 941 (6th Cir. 1978) (panel opinion).

Thus this record shows that Special Assistant United States Attorney General Piliaris has been properly designated to perform his grand jury assignment. There are no findings before this court to indicate that he has done anything except demonstrate a zealous interest in collecting federal taxes for a single client – the United States. This clearly has not increased his popularity with the taxpayer, but it does not reflect any lack of legal ethics.

The possible abuse of petitioner General Motors' interests which might arguably develop from the instant investigation can result only if there proves to be no probable cause for grand jury criminal indictment and there is proof that the government in bad faith undertook to employ a grand jury purely for purposes of civil tax investigation. See United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677, 683-84 (1958). Here the District Judge found that there had been no such proof.[1] There is nothing to indicate that his finding is clearly erroneous.

Further, the District Judge granted General Motors' motion for a protective order specifically guarding against such abuse.[2]

[1] The District Judge found:

> Whatever the motivation there is no evidence that the Justice Department in this case plans or intends to use the grand jury subpoenas to gather evidence not relating to its criminal investigation.

[2] The District Judge's oral opinion said:

> Specifically the Court determines that attorneys for the government may not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury to agency personnel except for technical assistance and then only as specifically authorized by the Court.

The District Judge's protective order provided:

> This protective order applies with respect to the grand jury investigation of General Motors Corporation and others referred to in the pleadings and briefs in the above-entitled matter.
>
> Except as authorized by this order or as authorized by other written orders of the Court, Attorneys for the Government shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury to persons other than jurors, interpreters, stenographers, operators of recording devices, typists, and other attorneys for the government.
>
> The Court is concerned with substance, not form. Applications for specific authorization, the procedure with respect thereto and the Court's action thereon, shall be in a manner substantially consistent with the Court's oral opinion of June 28, 1977.
> Attorneys for the Government shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, or summaries thereof, to Internal Revenue Service personnel for the purpose of seeking advice or recommendations with respect to seeking indictments; and if Attorneys for the Government shall apply to the Court for an order authorizing disclosure to persons who are or have been employed by Internal Revenue Service, it shall be

General Motors has a complete remedy in objecting to any evidence being submitted in any subsequent civil tax case which was derived from bad faith employment of the grand jury and in appeal from any judgment rendered against it. The District Court and this court would be particularly alert to such a showing.

In short, we should deny mandamus because this record demonstrates no "exceptional condition," no "clear abuse of judicial discretion" or failure to exercise jurisdiction on the part of the District Judge and no denial of appellate review. Schlagenhauf v. Holder, supra; LaBuy v. Howes Leather Co., supra; United States v. United States District Court, supra.

We note that the Fourth Circuit has just decided a case which is in very close agreement with this opinion. In re Grand Jury Subpoenas, April, 1978, — F.2d — (4th Cir., Aug. 3, 1978).

The overriding consideration in the present proceeding is, as the majority opinion holds, that grand jury proceedings (the primary criminal investigative tool available to the United States) not be subject to piecemeal appeals and inordinate delays. Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323 (1940).

It would be particularly inappropriate if in this and other cases, the target of a grand jury investigation could delay pursuit of crime while it disputed the Attorney General's choice of the lawyer he deemed best fitted to carry on the government's investigation.

Judge Lively has authorized me to say that he joins this concurring opinion.

an implied representation that Attorneys for the Government will not seek or receive advice or recommendations from such persons with respect to what indictments, if any, to seek, and Attorneys for the Government shall not seek or receive advice or recommendations with respect thereto from such persons.

Attorneys for the Government are hereby authorized to make limited disclosure, as necessary, to persons for scientific analysis, advice, or opinion provided that such persons are not and have not been employed by Internal Revenue Service.

CELEBREZZE, Circuit Judge, dissenting. I believe that this Court has jurisdiction to hear the appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) and that it should exercise its discretion and do so. The Third Circuit has apparently approved this result, In re Grand Jury Impanled Jan. 21, 1975, 541 F.2d 373 (3d Cir. 1976); see also In re Grand Jury Investigation, 338 F. Supp. 1379 (W.D. Pa. 1972), and the majority cites no cases on point holding to the contrary.

The majority's assertion that this case does not involve a "civil action" squarely contradicts language in both United States v. Neiberger, 460 F.2d 290, 292 (6th Cir. 1972), and United States v. Calandra, 455 F.2d 750, 752-53 (6th Cir. 1972). The majority, curiously, does not mention Neiberger or Calandra, apparently seeking to overrule them sub silentio.[1]

The majority's concern with piecemeal appeals in the grand jury context is well founded, but it overreacts to this concern. There are two safeguards built into § 1292(b) which would sift out almost all interlocutory appeals like this one stemming from grand jury proceedings. First, there is the required certification by the district court and, second, there is the discretion given to the court of appeals to decide whether to hear such appeals. These safeguards would protect against interlocutory appeals in the grand jury context, save for the extraordinary case. I believe that this is an extraordinary case and that the prior panel did not act improvidently in exercising its discretion to hear the appeal.

I respectfully dissent.

[1] The majority's mechanical interpretation of the phrase "civil action" goes too far. In another context, the Supreme Court has refused to find a "civil" or "criminal" label dispositive but has instead focused upon underlying policy considerations in deciding the propriety of federal abstention from interference with state court proceedings. Huffman v. Pursue, Ltd., 420 U.S. 592 (1975).

WEICK, Circuit Judge, Dissenting. This is one of the most important cases ever to be presented to an appellate court for review. It involves grand jury abuse where the constitutional right to due process of law of citizens being investigated, is alleged to have been flagrantly violated by an unlawful practice. The unlawful practice is that of appointing as Special Attorney to conduct the grand jury investigation, one who is an attorney for, and is on the payroll of, an aggrieved Government agency, and which agency in reality is the victim of an alleged fraud. Persons being investigated by a grand jury are presumed to be innocent, and a properly appointed Special Attorney owes a duty to protect them from unfounded prosecution.

A panel of this Court, in an opinion reported in 573 F.2d 936 (6th Cir. 1978), held that the attorney for the aggrieved agency (who was on the agency's payroll) had a conflict of interest, or an appearance of a conflict of interest, and was disqualified from acting as a Special Attorney to conduct a grand jury investigation of activities in which the agency or its employees were involved. The panel reversed the judgment of the District Court which had denied General Motor's motion to disqualify the attorney.

I

A grand jury is an arm of the court and is subject to its supervision and control. Ample power to investigate, to correct, and to put a stop to, grand jury abuse is vested in Judicial Councils, 28 U.S.C. § 332(d), and the Judicial Conference of the United States, 28 U.S.C. § 331. Appellate Courts have power to rule on these abuses on direct appeal, 28 U.S.C. § 1291, on interlocutory appeal, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), and under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651.

Despite all this authority the en banc majority has declined to exercise its rightful jurisdiction, and by its reasoning, which is believed to be specious, has dismissed GM's appeal for lack of jurisdiction. As Judge Celebrezze points out in his dissent, the majority cites no cases on point in support of its position.

It cannot be seriously controverted that many abuses now exist in grand jury functions, which cry out for reform. They are detailed in an article appearing in the American Bar Association Journal, March, 1978, Vol. 64, page 337, a copy of which is appended hereto. The Association has endorsed a comprehensive set of proposals for grand jury reform. Curiously enough, one of the proposed reforms states: "A prosecutor would not be allowed to use the grand jury to assist in an administrative inquiry . . . ." Id. at 338.

In the present case the grand jury is not only being used to assist in the administrative inquiry, but also the Special Attorney conducting the grand jury investigation is the attorney for, and is on the payroll of, the aggrieved agency, and the one who recommended the grand jury investigation.[1]

The IRS already had ample statutory authority to conduct its own investigation, and it did not need the grand jury. 26 U.S.C. § 7601 et seq.

It also appears from the ABA article that Congress has been looking into grand jury abuse since 1973, and that both Senate and House Committees have conducted extensive hearings. It is stated that "many provisions in the pending legislation mirror proposals contained in the Association-approved package."

The activities of Congress, of the ABA, and of other organizations, for grand jury reform, might not have been necessary if the judiciary had performed its rightful function. We should not abdicate our own responsibilities to correct grand jury abuse.

[1] GM had filed with the IRS affidavits detailing abuses and misconduct of IRS agents in visiting various GM plants and insulting its employees. GM alleges that the IRS never investigated these charges, but was using these same agents to testify before the grand jury and presumably they would be examined by the IRS attorney conducting the grand jury investigation.

As Mr. Justice Brennan well stated in his dissent in Kremens v. Bartley, 431 U.S. 119, 137 (1977):

> As was true three Terms ago with respect to another sensitive case brought to this Court, I can "find no justification for the Court's straining to rid itself of this dispute." DeFunis v. Odegaard, 416 U.S. 312, 349 (1974) (Brennan, J., dissenting). "Although the Court should, of course, avoid unnecessary decisions of constitutional questions, we should not transform principles of avoidance of constitutional decisions into devices for sidestepping resolution of difficult cases." Id. at 350.

The District Judge realized fully the gravity of this matter. It was evidenced in an exchange which took place between Government counsel and the Judge, and is illuminating:

> THE COURT: Why can't you take any Internal Revenue Service lawyer and make him a special attorney by appointment and turn the grand jury investigation over to him, let him run the whole show?
>
> MR. McBRIDE: Conceivably that could be done.
>
> THE COURT: You are saying that would be appropriate?
>
> MR. McBRIDE: Yes, your Honor, for this reason —
>
> THE COURT: I ought not be concerned with it?
> MR. McBRIDE: Again for this reason that the law, Section 515 and 543 of Title 28, does not put any limits on the authority of the attorney general. It puts him in control and GM, nor the Court, if I may be forgiven to say so, are not, I think, in a position, and GM should not be able to dictate who it will have conducting this grand jury or to assist in the conduct of this grand jury as it has also been trying to dictate who would be persons to assist the government attorneys and suggesting that we have other people. [A.261-62]

The panel majority answered the Government's contention as follows:

> As we have held, the power of appointment resides in the Attorney General or in his designated assistant. This power of appointment does not authorize the Attorney General, or his associate, to appoint an attorney who has a conflict of interest or an appearance of a conflict, nor does it immunize such an appointment so as to prevent judicial review. The courts have jurisdiction in a proper case to decide whether such conflict or appearance of conflict exists. (573 F.2d at 943)

In authorizing the interlocutory appeal the District Court certified:

> The undersigned is of the opinion that this order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion, and that an immediate appeal from this order as authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) may materially advance the ultimate termination of this litigation.

GM filed in this Court a notice of appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, which was docketed as a direct appeal (No. 77-1508), and a petition for leave to appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). The Government filed a motion to dismiss the direct appeal. An administrative panel of this Court, consisting of Judges Weick, Edwards and Celebrezze, granted the Government's motion to dismiss the direct appeal. By the same order that panel allowed interlocutory appeal. It should not be necessary for GM to have two appeals pending here from the same order.[2]

[2] It is astounding that the majority would endeavor to denigrate the panel's order by the statement:

> Without oral argument or conference consideration an administrative panel of said court consisting of Judges Weick, Edwards and Celebrezze, entered an order on October 3, 1977 dismissing General Motor's § 1291 appeal (No. 77-1508) but granting General Motor's leave to proceed under § 1292(b). [Italics mine].

It was leave to appeal which was granted.

The inference to be drawn from this statement is that the action of the panel did not receive adequate consideration. If the practice

The administrative panel probably should have deferred action on the motion to dismiss. It certainly could not foresee that an en banc court would undertake to vacate its grant of permission to appeal and hold that such permission had been improvidently granted after the case had been heard and decided on its merits by the regular panel to whom the appeal had been assigned.

Section 1292(b) permits an interlocutory appeal in a civil action. The ground for the Government's motion to dismiss was that a grand jury proceeding is not a civil action. The Government did not claim that the interlocutory appeal had been improvidently granted. The Government cites no authority holding that a grand jury proceeding is a criminal action. As Judge Celebrezze points out in his dissent, our Court has previously spoken twice on this important issue. United States v. Neiberger, 460 F.2d 290, 292 (6th Cir. 1972); United States v. Calandra, 455 F.2d 750, 752-53 (6th Cir. 1972), rev'd on other grounds, 414 U.S. 338 (1974).

In Neiberger we allowed the Government to appeal under § 1291 from an order of the District Court denying its application for a grant of immunity to grand jury witnesses. We stated:

> This is a final decision in a civil action and, hence, subject to appeal to this court.

of not allowing oral arguments on motions is "not adequate," the fact is that the members of the en banc majority are equally responsible for adopting such a practice, or at least for permitting it to exist. The truth is, however, that the practice of not allowing oral argument on motions is prevalent in all of the Circuits, and even in the Supreme Court. We do not even allow oral arguments in all cases and in some Circuits many cases are decided on briefs.

As to conference consideration, this frequently occurs when the Court is in session. If no conference is held the Judges communicate by memos, or letters, which are sufficient.

As to the statement in the majority opinion that the Government filed a motion to vacate the panel opinion, I have not seen any such motion, and do not believe that a motion was filed. The Government did file a petition for rehearing en banc, which is governed by our Rule 3b.

Calandra also involved an appeal under § 1291 by the Government from an order entered in a grand jury proceeding.[3]

Neither Calandra nor Neiberger, as Judge Celebrezze points out, are mentioned in the majority opinion, and are being overruled sub silentio.

A grand jury proceeding does not become criminal as to a defendant until the grand jury returns an indictment against the defendant. As well stated in Post v. United States, 161 U.S. 583, 587 (1896):

> Criminal proceedings cannot be said to be brought or instituted until a formal charge is openly made against the accused, either by indictment presented or information filed in court, or, at least, by complaint before a magistrate.

See also Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7 (1918).

The majority (in our case) states:

> Even if this appeal could be characterized as an appeal in a "civil action" within the meaning of § 1292(b), we would exercise our statutory discretion by dismissing this appeal since we do not believe that resolution of this issue at this time would "materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." The legislative history of the Interlocutory Appeals Act suggests that interlocutory appeals, even in civil cases, should be "sparingly granted." To allow an appeal when the District Court has refused to disqualify a government lawyer from a grand jury investigation simply disrupts the investigation and creates the possibility that the target of the inquiry – by the threat of delay and protracted legal maneuvering – will exert unwarranted influence in the government's choice of its prosecuting attorney.

[3] In other cases the Government was successful in maintaining that a grand jury proceeding is a civil action. See, e.g., United States v. Judson, 322 F.2d 460 (9th Cir. 1963); United States v. Doe (Gravel), 455 F.2d 753 (1st Cir.), vacated on other grounds, 408 U.S. 606 (1972).

The majority overlooks the fact that an Administrative Panel of this Court had previously exercised its statutory discretion in allowing the interlocutory appeal after it had been duly certified by the same District Judge who had denied GM's motion to disqualify the IRS attorney. GM in reliance on the order allowing its interlocutory appeal, filed in this Court the record on appeal and its briefs and appendices. The appeal was assigned for hearing before a regularly constituted panel of this Court. The appeal was argued orally by counsel on both sides and submitted to the Court. The Court after consideration, decided the case on its merits and reversed the judgment of the District Court for error in denying GM's motion to disqualify the IRS attorney. It would appear to be unseemly for the en banc majority at this late date to undertake to re-examine the decision of the Administrative Panel (which had been entrusted by this Court with the power to hear and determine such matters) after the case had been heard and decided by the hearing panel on its merits.

Judge Gibbons has well stated the rule with respect to discretion in Katz v. Carte Blanche Corp., 496 F.2d 747 (3rd Cir. 1974), at 756:

> The key consideration is not whether the order involves the exercise of discretion, but whether it truly implicates the policies favoring interlocutory appeal. The determination of what orders are properly reviewable under § 1292 (b) must be made by a practical application of those policies, not by a mechanical application of labels such as "discretionary" or "nondiscretionary." Those policies, both before and since the enactment of § 1292(b) have included the avoidance of harm to a party pendente lite from a possibly erroneous interlocutory order and the avoidance of possibly wasted trial time and litigation expense. In this case, as subsequent discussion will disclose, there exists by virtue of the order appealed from both the possibility of prejudice to a party pendente lite and the possibility of considerable avoidable wasted trial time and litigation expense.

To the same effect, see Melamed v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 534 F.2d 82, 84 (6th Cir. 1976).

It is also unfair to GM which undoubtedly relied on the order of the Administrative Panel granting leave to file its interlocutory appeal and dismissing its direct appeal. Had GM known that its interlocutory appeal would ever be dismissed by an en banc court because improvidently granted by the Administrative Panel, it would certainly have petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari to review the order of the Administrative Panel dismissing its direct appeal. It ought not be necessary for GM to have two appeals pending to review a single order of the District Court. GM should not be prejudiced by unprecedented maneuvers of this Court.

It has not been the practice of this Court to treat orders allowing appeals made by Administrative Panels in the manner which was inflicted on GM in the present case. In Cardwell v. Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., 504 F.2d 444 (6th Cir. 1974), this Court in an opinion written by Circuit Judge McCree decided the merits of an interlocutory appeal in a F.E.L.A. suit for damages after an Administrative Panel of this Court had allowed the appeal. Judge McCree pointed out, however, for the benefit of District Courts and litigants that this particular use should not be made of the statute. Cardwell was cited in 16 Wright-Miller-Cooper-Gressman Federal Practice and Procedure § 3929, at 142 (1977) and the authors state:

> It does not make sense to vacate a grant of permission to appeal, however, if the appeal has been argued and the only purpose is to instruct litigants and district courts that a particular use should not be made of the statute. In such cases, the appeal should be decided, and the deterrent function can be served by a statement of future policy.
> Although the case was of the sort that should not > give rise to an interlocutory appeal, and one judge had dissented from the grant of permission to appeal, "[n]evertheless, we have permitted the appeal, and to expedite the ultimate conclusion of this litigation, we consider the issue presented." Cardwell v. Chesapeake & O. Ry., C.A. 6th, 1974, 504 F.2d 444, 447.

The majority in the present case further disagreed with the Administrative Panel when it stated its disbelief that resolution of the issue at this time would "materially advance the ultimate termination of this litigation". It may well be doubted whether there is any case in which an interlocutory appeal could more "materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation" than in the present case. By declining to hear this appeal the majority is subjecting GM and the Government to a continuous grand jury investigation conducted by an attorney with a conflict of interest, with the attendant possibility of obtaining an invalid indictment, trial and conviction, before this issue of conflict of interest can be determined. The potential waste of time and money for both sides in such proceedings would be large. Both sides in the present case already must have expended considerable sums in GM's fruitless attempt to appeal, in which it used all known means, namely, direct and interlocutory appeals. In addition, any subsequent civil tax proceeding against GM might be invalidated because of this taint.

The allowance of the appeal to GM does not disrupt the grand jury as claimed, since the grand jury may proceed and hear other matters referred to it. Cf. United States v. Wilson, 421 U.S. 309, 318 (1975), opinion announced by Chief Justice Burger.

Nor is there any merit in the contention of the majority that the allowance of the appeal "will exert unwarranted influence in the Government's choice of its prosecuting attorney." The Government in this case has never claimed that it has the right to appoint a special attorney who has a conflict of interest, to conduct a grand jury investigation.

The contention by the majority in this case that interlocutory appeals should be "sparingly" granted has no application to the present case. The appeal was certified by the District Judge who was in charge of the grand jury and had full knowledge of the seriousness of the issues and of the necessity for their early determination. His certification was approved by the Administrative Panel and also a majority of the Panel hearing the case on its merits. In all fairness, what more should be required?

The federal judiciary should be commended for the manner in which it has handled interlocutory appeals. Applications for a few more than one hundred interlocutory appeals are made each year and only about one-half are granted. The statute has not made serious inroads into the final judgment rule. 16 Wright-Miller-Cooper-Gressman Federal Practice and Procedure § 3929, at 133 (1977).

If there was any question about the majority not wanting to hear this appeal, the answer is found by reading footnote 2 on page 4 of its opinion, where the following language appears:

> General Motors argues in the alternative that we should assert appellate jurisdiction by treating this appeal as a petition for writ of mandamus under 28 U.S.C. § 1361 or § 1651. The Court does not reach or decide this question because General Motors has not applied for a writ of mandamus in this proceeding, and the District Judge has not received notice or had an opportunity to be heard and thus has not been made a litigant on this appeal.

As pointed out in the panel's opinion and the authorities there cited, it was not necessary for GM to file a mandamus action as the Court may treat the interlocutory appeal as a petition for a writ of mandamus under the All Writs Act. 573 F.2d at 940. Furthermore, GM has acquiesced in the panel's treatment. The statement by the majority that the District Judge who is not a party to this appeal, has not received notice or had an opportunity to be heard, borders on the ridiculous.

The professed concern of the en banc majority for the District Judge is not understandable since the majority has discarded the District Judge's certification and dismissed the interlocutory appeal after an Administrative Panel of this Court had allowed the appeal and a regularly constituted panel assigned to hear the case had heard and decided the appeal on its merits. Such action by the majority in depriving GM of its right to appeal is not only unprecedented, it is also unbelievable.

It is further stated in the majority opinion that GM did not appeal from the order of the Administrative Panel dismissing its direct appeal. It may be properly assumed that the reason GM did not appeal from that panel's order was that it was unnecessary since the panel had granted GM leave to file an interlocutory appeal. Had GM any idea that its interlocutory appeal was going to be dismissed, it would undoubtedly have petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari to review the dismissal of its direct appeal.

The fairness asserted by the majority in its even considering now GM's appeal under § 1291 and then denying it, relying on inapposite authorities, obviously was of no help to GM. All Courts are required to treat litigants fairly. Neither of the two cases cited by the majority as authority for again dismissing GM's direct appeal involved final orders. Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323 (1940), involved only an order of the District Court denying a motion to quash a grand jury subpoena, which clearly was not a final order. United States v. Ryan, 402 U.S. 530 (1971), likewise involved an order (not final) of the District Court denying a motion to quash a grand jury subpoena duces tecum.[4] [4] Mr. Ryan's conviction for obstruction of justice was reversed in United States v. Ryan, 455 F.2d 728 (9th Cir. 1971), which case is interesting because it did involve some grand jury abuse and other abuses which are pointed out in the opinion of the Court.

Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 46 U.S.L.W. 4757 (U.S. June 21, 1978), is inapposite as its holding was that denial of only the class action aspects of a case was not appealable as it is not a final order.

The decision of the majority in dismissing GM's direct appeal on the ground that the order appealed from is not a final order, conflicts with a recent decision of our Court in Melamed v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 534 F.2d 82, 84 (6th Cir. 1976), before Judges Peck, Miller and McAllister, stating:[5]

> Initially, we are confronted with the issue of whether the district court's order denying Continental's motion for disqualification of Winston & Strawn is appealable at this stage of the proceedings as a final decision of the district court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291. While this precise issue has not previously been before this Court, other circuits considering the question have generally concluded that an order denying a motion for disqualification is appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Silver Chrysler Plymouth, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 496 F.2d 800 (2d Cir. 1974) (en banc) (cases cited); see Kroungold v. Triester, 521 F.2d 763 (3d Cir. 1975); Fullmer v. Harper, 517 F.2d 20 (10th Cir. 1975); Yablonski v. United Mine Workers, 147 U.S.App.D.C. 193, 454 F.2d 1036 (1971) (dicta), cert. denied, 406 U.S. 906, 92 S.Ct. 1609, 31 L.Ed.2d 816 (1972); Uniweld Products, Inc. v. Union Carbide Corp., 385 F.2d 992 (5th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 921, 88 S.Ct. 853, 19 L.Ed.2d 980 (1968). Contra, Cord v. Smith, 338 F.2d 516 (9th Cir. 1964).
> In Cord, although an order denying a motion for disqualification was held not appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, the court, treating the appeal from the order as a petition for a writ under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651, stated at page 522:

[5] It is not believable that the majority intended to overrule Melamed sub silentio.

> Continued participation as an attorney, by one who is disqualified by a conflict of interest from so doing, will bring about the very evil which the rule against his participation is designed to prevent, and a subsequent reversal based upon such participation cannot undo the damage that will have been done as a result of such participation. We therefore proceed to the merits.

In holding that an order denying a motion for disqualification was appealable, the court in Silver Chrysler Plymouth, supra, stated at page 805-06:

> . . . the order is collateral to the main proceeding yet has grave consequences to the losing party, and it is fatuous to suppose that review of the final judgment will provide adequate relief. . . .
> By holding such an order directly appealable, we eliminate the uncertainties (and the paperwork) attendant to resorting to § 1292(b) and/or § 1651. Since the ultimate objective is to bring before an appellate court an important question which, if unresolved, might well taint a trial, why should not this question be presented before judicial and attorney time may have been needlessly expended?

We find the reasoning of Silver Chrysler Plymouth to be persuasive and hold the order in this case appealable because it is a "final disposition of a claimed right which is not an ingredient of the cause of action and does not require consideration with it." Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 547, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 1226, 93 L.Ed. 1528, 1536 (1949).

Accord, Cleveland v. Cleveland Elec. Illuminating Co., 440 F. Supp. 193 (N.D. Ohio 1976), aff'd, 573 F.2d 1310 (6th Cir. 1977).

In In re Investigation Before April 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600, 605 (D.C. Cir. 1976), the Court stated in footnote 8:

> In the context of a trial rather than a grand jury proceeding, it has been held that an order granting a motion to disqualify counsel is a final judgment under the collateral order doctrine of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949). E. g., Hull v. Celanese Corp., 513 F.2d 568, 570-71 (2d Cir. 1975); Draganescu v. First Nat'l Bank, 502 F.2d 550, 551 (5th Cir. 1974); Richardson v. Hamilton Int'l Corp., 469 F.2d 1382, 1383 n. 1 (3d Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 986, 93 S.Ct. 2271, 36 L.Ed.2d 964 (1973); United States v. Hankish, 462 F.2d 316, 318 (4th Cir. 1972) (dictum); Brown v. Miller, 52 U.S.App. D.C. 330, 286 F. 994 (1923) (attorney himself appeals; jurisdiction assumed without discussion). In fact, although there was originally some authority for the view that orders denying a motion for disqualifiaction were not appealable under Cohen, e. g., Fleischer v. Phillips, 264 F.2d 515, 516-17 (2d Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Fleischer v. Benjamin, 359 U.S. 1002, 79 S.Ct. 1139, 3 L.Ed.2d 1030 (1959); Marco v. Dulles, 268 F.2d 192, 193 (2d Cir. 1959), the weight of recent authority is definitely in the direction of treating the denial of such motions as final orders, e. g., Yablonski v. UMW, 147 U.S. App.D.C. 193, 454 F.2d 1036, 1038 & n. 9 (1971), cert. denied, 406 U.S. 906, 92 S.Ct. 1609, 31 L.Ed.2d 816 (1972) (order denying motion for disqualification appealable where the disqualification was predicated upon ethical considerations and "additionally upon significant impingement on a specific legislative policy"); Silver Chrysler Plymouth, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 496 F.2d 800 (2d Cir. 1974) (en banc) (reviewing the cases); Ceramco, Inc. v. Lee Pharmaceuticals, 510 F.2d 268, 270-71 (2d Cir. 1975) (citing Silver Chrysler Plymouth, supra); Kroungold v. Triester, 521 F.2d 763, 765 (3d Cir. 1975); American Roller Co. v. Budinger, 513 F.2d 982, 983 (3d Cir. 1975); Greene v. Singer Co., 509 F.2d 750, 751 (3d Cir. 1971); United States v. Garcia, 517 F.2d 272, 275 (5th Cir. 1975) (criminal trial); Uniweld Prods., Inc. v. Union Carbide Corp.,, [sic] 385 F.2d 992, 994 (5th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 921, 88 S.Ct. 853, 19 L. Ed.2d 980 (1968); Tomlinson v. Florida Iron & Metal, Inc., 291 F.2d 333, 334 (5th Cir. 1961) (order denying motion for disqualification is final where "harm resulting therefrom is in the nature of the frustration of a public policy which cannot be avoided or mitigated by an appeal taken after the trial"); Fullmer v. Harper, 517 F.2d 20, 21 (10th Cir. 1975). But see Cord v. Smith, 338 F.2d 516, 521 (9th Cir. 1964).

We find ourselves in agreement with those cases holding that an order granting a motion for disqualification is appealable, and it is our view that the factors justifying that conclusion in the trial context are equally applicable to grand jury proceedings. Indeed, even if we were to conclude that the question of appealability was closer than we think it to be, we would be disposed to take a more expansive approach to the collateral order doctrine in the grand jury context than in the trial context since allowing such appeals is less likely to involve "the mischief of economic waste and of delayed justice," Radio Station WOW, Inc. v. Johnson, 326 U.S. 120, 124, 65 S.Ct. 1475, 1478, 89 L.Ed. 2092 (1945). Cf. United States v. Wilson, 421 U.S. 309, 318, 95 S.Ct. 1802, 44 L.Ed.2d 186 (1975), in which Chief Justice Burger, writing for the Court, had an opportunity to compare trials and grand jury proceedings in terms of the obstruction that would be caused by requiring Rule 42(b) criminal contempt hearings for refusal to testify: "A grand jury ordinarily deals with many inquiries and cases at one time, and it can rather easily suspend action on any one, and turn to another while proceedings under Rule 42(b) are completed. . . . Trial courts, on the contrary, cannot be expected to dart from case to case any time a witness who has been granted immunity decides not to answer questions."

In addition to In re Investigation Before the April 1975 Grand Jury, supra, two other cases have explicitly held that an order disqualifying an attorney from representing witnesses before a grand jury is appealable under the collateral order exception. These cases are: In re Investigation Before the Feb. 1977 Lynchburg Grand Jury, 563 F.2d 652, 655 (4th Cir. 1977), and In re Grand Jury Empaneled Jan. 21, 1975, 536 F.2d 1009, 1011 (3d Cir. 1976). Two other cases have entertained such appeals without discussing jurisdiction: In re Taylor, 567 F.2d 1183 (2d Cir. 1977), and In re Gopman, 531 F.2d 262 (5th Cir. 1976).

The majority refers to the rule prohibiting piecemeal appeals in criminal cases; but this is not a criminal case. Even in criminal cases piecemeal appeals have been allowed by the Supreme Court. In United States v. MacDonald, 46 U.S.L.W. 4395 (U.S. May 1, 1978), the Court said:

> This Court in criminal cases has twice departed from the general prohibition against piecemeal appellate review [citing Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651 (1977), and Stack v. Boyle, 341 U.S. 1 (1951)]. In each instance, the Court relied on the final judgment rule's "collateral order" exception articulated in Cohen v. Beneficial Indus. Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541, 545, 547 (1949).

By authority of Cohen, GM's appeal under § 1291 was proper and the Administrative Panel should not have dismissed it. Melamed v. ITT Continental Baking Co., supra; In re Investigation Before 1975 Grand Jury, supra. The majority erred when it reconsidered GM's § 1291 appeal and dismissed it.

The majority further contends that GM has a remedy of appeal if it is convicted of a crime and may also appeal from any unauthorized use of grand jury materials by the IRS. But this would involve protracted and very expensive litigation, both for GM and for the Government, which litigation the interlocutory appeal is designed to avoid. Kraus v. Board of County Road Comm'rs, 364 F.2d 919, 921 (6th Cir. 1966)

(approving resolution adopted by Judicial Conference of the United States relating to interolcutory appeals). Melamed v. ITT Continental Baking Co., supra; In re Investigation Before 1975 Grand Jury, supra.

An appellate court has the power to review by mandamus an issue of first impression involving a basic undecided problem. Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104, 110 (1964); United States v. United States District Court, 444 F.2d 651, 656 (6th Cir. 1971), aff'd, 407 U.S. 297 (1972). Surely this is such a case.

II.

The majority did not pass upon the issue of disqualification of Mr. Piliaris, no doubt because it ruled it had no jurisdiction. Any ruling which it would make on the merits of the case would have been obiter dicta.[6]

It appears that the appointment of an agency attorney as a Special Attorney to conduct a grand jury investigation in a matter which the agency attorney has instigated, and in which he had been previously involved, is not an isolated incident. In the panel majority opinion we cited the case of United States v. Braniff Airways, Inc., 428 F. Supp. 579 (W.D. Tex. 1977), where a similar situation existed with an attorney, formerly employed by the Civil Aeronautics Board, who had been appointed as Special Attorney to conduct a grand jury investigation concerning the very subject upon which he had previously passed while in the employ of the Board. The District Court granted defendant's motion to dismiss the indictment because of this impropriety, holding that the attorney was an unauthorized person to appear before the grand jury.

[6] The role of Mr. Piliaris was shown by uncontroverted evidence. The avoidance of harm to a party pendente lite from a possibly erroneous interlocutory order and the possibility of wasted trial time and large litigation expense both to the party and to the Government surely satisfies all the legal requirements for an interlocutory appeal. Katz v. Carte Blanche Corp., supra; Melamed v. ITT Continental Baking Co., supra.

The en banc majority should therefore exercise its rightful jurisdiction and on the uncontroverted evidence re-enter the judgment of the hearing panel.

The amicus curiae brief filed by the law firm of Edward Bennett Williams refers to still another case involving similar facts. In that case, No. 77-CR-1073 presently pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Velsicol Chemical Corporation has moved to dismiss an indictment pending against it and several of its present and past employees, on the ground that an Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) attorney, who was appointed as a Special Attorney to conduct the grand jury investigating the defendants, previously had substantial connection, as an EPA lawyer, with the matter under grand jury investigation.

If attorneys for the IRS, the Civil Aeronautics Board, and the EPA, all with conflicts of interest, may be appointed as Special Attorneys to conduct grand jury investigations, this practice can soon spread to all of the many agencies of the federal government.

SEC attorneys were recently rebuffed in their attempt to obtain disclosure of evidence developed in a grand jury investigation in which the SEC was interested. The Court held that these attorneys were not attorneys for the Government as defined in Rule 54(c) Fed. R. Crim. P. In re Grand Jury Investigation, 414 F. Supp. 74, 76 (S.D. N.Y. 1976).

A similar ruling was made with respect to attorneys for the Federal Trade Commission in In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 309 F.2d 440, 443 (3d Cir. 1962). The Court rejected the argument that the agency attorney and the Department of Justice attorney were attorneys for the same client, namely, the United States. The amicus brief points out:

> Different departments and agencies of the federal government represent and reflect different economic, social and political interests which are frequently in opposition.

This was the situation in the case in which Mr. Williams' firm was involved where the Secretary of Agriculture disagreed with the EPA and litigation ensued. Amicus brief, p. 10, 11.

State courts have disqualified prosecuting attorneys from trying criminal cases where they have a conflict of interest. The disqualification is based upon violation of the constitutional right of the defendant to a fair and impartial trial.

In People v. Superior Court of Contra Costa County, 19 Cal. 3d 255, 561 P.2d 1164, 137 Cal. Rptr. 476 (1977), the Superior Court disqualified the prosecutor from proceeding in a murder case in which the victim's mother was employed in the office of the prosecutor. The California Supreme Court in a unanimous opinion affirming, stated:

> A fair and impartial trial is a fundamental aspect of the right of accused persons not to be deprived of liberty without due process of law. [Citing authority].
> It is the obligation of the prosecutor, as well as of the court, to respect this mandate. [Citing authority]. . . . As such, he is in a peculiar and very definite sense the servant of the law, the twofold aim of which is that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer. [Citing authority]. (561 P.2d at 1171)

This same twofold duty had previously been announced by the Supreme Court in United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974). Mr. Piliaris, as attorney for the IRS, was under no such duty. He never should have been appointed as Special Attorney to conduct the grand jury investigation of GM.

The California Supreme Court further stated:

> We have so far examined the problem of prosecutorial impartiality largely from the perspective of the accused. Society also has an interest in both the reality and the appearance of impartiality by its prosecuting officials: "It is essential that the public have absolute confidence in the integrity and impartiality of our system of criminal justice. This requires that public officials not only in fact properly discharge their responsibilities but also that > such officials avoid, as much as is possible, the appearance of impropriety." (Fn. omitted.) (People v. Rhodes (1974) 12 Cal.3d 180, 185, 115 Cal.Rptr. 235, 239, 524 P.2d 363, 367.) Similar considerations led the American Bar Association to adopt, in its Standards Relating to the Prosecution Function, a provision that "A prosecutor should avoid the appearance or reality of a conflict of interest with respect to his official duties." (Approved Draft 1971, pt. 1, std. 1.2.)

> For all the foregoing reasons we conclude that a trial judge may exercise his power to disqualify a district attorney from participating in the prosecution of a criminal charge when the judge determines that the attorney suffers from a conflict of interest which might prejudice him against the accused and thereby affect, or appear to affect, his ability to impartially perform the discretionary functions of his office. [Footnote omitted.] (561 P.2d at 1173)

Murderers and persons with long criminal records have secured protection of their constitutional rights by the Supreme Court and other federal courts. See, e.g., Lockett v. Ohio, 46 U.S.L.W. 4981 (U.S. July 3, 1978); Bell v. Ohio, 46 U.S.L.W. 4995 (U.S. July 3, 1978); United States v. Doss, 563 F.2d 265, 282 (6th Cir. 1977) (en banc) (Weick & Engel, JJ., dissenting); Flynt v. Leis, 574 F.2d 874 (6th Cir. 1978), petition for cert. filed, 47 U.S.L.W. 3027 (U.S. Aug. 8, 1978) (No. 77-1618). (Federal District Court injunction restrained state court criminal trial of obscenity case notwithstanding provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 2283.) Wealthy persons and large corporations with millions of shareholders, such as GM, have constitutional rights which are just as dear to them, and they are equally entitled to protection of those rights from violation.

The authorities cited herein demonstrate that the en banc majority opinion not only conflicts with the settled and well-established law of the Sixth Circuit, which the majority has apparently overlooked as it is not even discussed, but its opinion is also against the great weight of authority.

The salutary doctrine of stare decisis ought not to be ignored.

In sum, the ruling of the majority in dismissing GM's direct appeal was clear error because the order appealed from was a final order appealable under § 1291.

The dismissal of the interlocutory appeal was error.[7]

The judiciary should not shirk the performance of its responsibilities to all persons alike who are entitled to the equal protection of the law, due process of the law and a fair and impartial grand jury proceeding.

This Court should take jurisdiction and reverse the judgment of the District Court denying GM's motion to disqualify, as was ordered by the Panel that heard the case on its merits.

[7] The concurring opinion of our learned colleague Judge Edwards is curious. Although it agrees with Judge Merritt's majority opinion that this Court lacked jurisdiction, Judge Edwards states that the Court did have jurisdiction properly to consider the merits of the case under the All Writs statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1651. The trouble is, Judge Merritt did not exercise that jurisdiction and did not consider the appeal and pass upon the merits. Judge Edwards then undertakes to exercise that jurisdiction and to consider the appeal on its merits, under the All Writs Act, and determined as a matter of law that no conflict of interest was shown by the evidence, and therefore jurisdiction should not be exercised and the appeal therefore should be dismissed.

I respectfully submit that Judge Edwards' treatment of the case conflicts with Judge Merritt's opinion. If this Court really lacked jurisdiction of the appeal, Judge Edwards was without jurisdiction to pass upon the merits of the case and his rulings are pure dicta. Furthermore, if it was determined that GM's appeal failed on its merits, the judgment of the District Court should have been affirmed rather than GM's appeal dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

The fact that the District Court granted GM's motion for a protective order is not relevant to the issue whether the IRS attorney should have been disqualified for conflict of interest, nor does it adequately protect the rights of GM.

Our citizens who are being investigated by a grand jury surely have the right to object to an attorney on the payroll of the victim of the alleged fraud conducting the grand jury proceedings, and this injustice should be stopped by the courts as soon as the issue is presented, not delayed while the citizens are continuously subjected to this improper treatment.

[EXCERPTS FROM AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION JOURNAL – MARCH, 1978]

REMEDY FOR THE GRAND JURY: RETAIN BUT REFORM

The Association has endorsed a comprehensive set of proposals for grand jury reform. The most controversial is permitting counsel for a witness in the grand jury room.

By Richard E. Gerstein and Laurie O. Robinson

Last year the press reported on charges of grand jury abuse and assertions that a grand jury's functions had been distorted to pursue illegitimate ends. Were these accusations voiced by antiwar activists, the Harrisburg Eight, or organized crime? No. They came from General Motors, and G.M. is not alone. Litton Industries, Bethlehem Steel, and the National Council of Churches, among other well-established groups, have joined the call for grand jury reform.

The grand jury needs attention. Grand jury proceedings constitute the one stage of the criminal justice process that has escaped the due process scrutiny to which other aspects of the system have been subjected during the past two decades.

Many attacks have been leveled at the grand jury in recent years. Critics charge that it has departed radically from its proper constitutional function of protecting citizens from unwarranted prosecution and has evolved into a prosecutorial tool devoid of due process. Allegations have been made that the Nixon administration used the grand jury for political, rather than law enforcement, purposes.

The American Bar Association's House of Delegates stepped into this controversy last August by overwhelmingly endorsing a comprehensive set of proposals for grand jury reform. These recommendations could change and give renewed life to the grand jury at both federal and state levels. This action has given impetus to legislation pending in the Congress. It will help to accelerate consideration of similar bills before state legislatures.

Is the grand jury obsolete? Should it be abolished? The Association has rightly opposed efforts to discard it as an anachronism. It should be retained, but with revamping to ensure fairness. The key role grand juries played during the Watergate scandal is testament to their vital part in our criminal justice system. The grand jury can perform an important function in investigating complex crimes, but the missing ingredient of adequate due process must be added.

Fairness Needs to Be Restored

The measures endorsed by the Association can help to save the grand jury from extinction by restoring fairness while preserving its legitimate functions.

The grand jury is an institution embodied in our common law traditions. It emerged in England in the twelfth century. Scholars dispute whether it was originally a body to further the king's powers or to serve as a protective shield between citizen and crown. Probably it served both functions, protecting citizens who were objects of governmental suspicion and providing an effective investigatory tool to ferret out criminal activity. When the colonists brought the grand jury to this country, however, it was clearly viewed as a citizen's body that could protect them from the whims of the royal governors and English tyranny. The requirement for indictment is embodied in the Constitution, thus mandating use of the grand jury to this day in all federal criminal cases.

But the institution has undergone a continuing evolution since its beginning. England abolished the grand jury in 1933. Many states have revised its functions. While no state has completely eliminated indictment as a means of initiating criminal prosecutions, a majority now allow prosecution by other routes as well. Some rarely use a grand jury, and several —Connecticut, Kansas, Michigan, Washington, and Wisconsin—have created "one-man" grand juries, granting a judicial officer many powers ordinarily associated with the grand jury.

Detractors of the grand jury and current practices claim it is an unsupervised strong arm of the prosecution. They contend that it is shielded from public scrutiny, unregulated by the courts, virtually unlimited in its subpoena powers, able to question witnesses behind closed doors, and capable of jailing recalcitrant witnesses without trial. They claim the grand jury no longer serves any protective function and that the minuscule percentage of "no bills" reflects reality: that the grand jury is only a rubber stamp for the prosecution.

The grand jury reform package adopted by the House of Delegates contains twenty-five legislative principles. These recommendations, if implemented, can restore fairness to the grand jury system. Counsel would be permitted to accompany a witness inside the grand jury room. A grand jury would not be allowed to name unindicted coconspirators or issue reports denigrating a person's normal fitness to hold office. Judicial review of grand jury reports would be provided prior to publication, with opportunity for persons discussed to seek expungement. Transactional, not the much more limited "use," immunity would be granted. The target of a grand jury investigation would in most instances be given the opportunity to testify. A grand jury subpoena would be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting and would identify the general subject area of the investigation. All grand jury proceedings, except the jurors' deliberations, would be recorded. A prosecutor would not be allowed to use the grand jury to assist in an administrative inquiry or to obtain evidence against an already-indicted person. Witnesses would be protected against harassment, unreasonable delays, and repeated appearances. They would not be required to parade before television cameras and the public to enter the grand jury room to testify.

These reform proposals, drafted by the Section of Criminal Justice's Committee on the Grand Jury, have drawn sharp attack. Opponents argue that they will seriously weaken the grand jury and impede and impair its functions.

The fiercest debate has centered on the principle that would allow counsel into the grand jury room. Federal prosecutors – the Department of Justice and United States attorneys around the country – have asserted that this would disrupt and delay grand jury investigations.

Opposition Arguments Are Weak

A more detailed examination of this recommendation, since it is a central thrust of the reform package, will illustrate the need for its implementation and the weakness of arguments in opposition.

It is surprising that this proposal is perceived as so radical that it prompted a personal appearance by Attorney General Griffin B. Bell to oppose it on the floor of the House of Delegates. Eleven states already allow counsel to accompany a witness before the grand jury. One of these, Michigan, is now considering broadening the practice, based on good experience with its present provision, which allows counsel before "one-man" grand juries. Last summer Colorado passed a comprehensive grand jury reform bill with the backing of Denver district attorney Dale Tooley. Massachusetts has just passed legislation allowing counsel inside the grand jury room. New York and California are considering legislation of this nature; in California it has the support of Evelle Younger, the law enforcement minded attorney general.

The American Law Institute has supported counsel for witnesses in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure. In the commentary to the code, the A.L.I. pointed out that "complex and important legal issues face a witness before the grand jury. An appearance before that body may subject an individual to the grave danger of self-incrimination or imprisonment for contempt. . . . The witness may also inadvertently lose his right to claim the privilege by operation of the doctrine of waiver. . . . And the inherent pressure and accompanying nervouseness of a grand jury appearance upon an individual may make it very difficult for him to remember his attorney's instructions."

Counsel Is Guaranteed

Why should a lawyer be allowed to enter the grand jury room with his client? The question would more appropriately be asked in the reverse–why not? Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice system is a person who wants a lawyer denied that right. A line of landmark cases from Powell v. Alabama to Miranda, Wade, Gilbert, and Argersinger, relying on requirements of the Sixth and Fourteenth amendments, have guaranteed the presence of counsel at every other critical stage of criminal proceeding.

Not having counsel present leaves a grand jury witness poorly protected. The lay witness is at a considerable disadvantage, having to make judgments even the most seasoned lawyer would find difficult. He is forced to make decisions, even while testifying, that will legally bind him. His testimony can later be used at trial to impeach him. He unwittingly can waive the privilege against self-incrimination. If he refuses to testify after receiving immunity, he subjects himself to imprisonment without trial.

Awkward Position for Witness

Under present practice, a grand jury witness who needs to consult counsel is put in an awkward position. He must ask permission, get up, go outside the grand jury room, repeat the question to his attorney, and then return. The process is inefficient and ineffective, as well as prejudicial to the witness. It annoys grand jurors and raises speculation in their minds as to the purposes of the consultation.

Charles Ruff, the last Watergate special prosecutor, testified before a congressional committee that "the mere possibility of occasional disruption simply cannot overcome the right of the individual witness to consult his attorney without going through the mildly absurd process of leaving the grand jury room every time. Indeed," he continued, "most prosecutors would admit . . . that they count on the burden of leaving the room to dissuade the witness from asserting his right to counsel."

There is another "catch-22" in the right to counsel. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has held that a prosecutor who grants a witness permission to leave the grand jury room to confer with counsel may later raise this fact as relevant to the perjury charges against the defendant. A dissenting judge decried the government's being "permitted to 'sandbag' him [the defendant] by using the fact that he consulted his attorney against him." United States v. Kopel, 552 F. 2d 1265 (1977).

Other courts—the Fifth Circuit, for example—have said a limit can be placed on how frequently the witness leaves the room to consult counsel. In re Tierney, 465 F. 2d 806 (1972).

Advocates of retaining the present practice assert that allowing a lawyer inside the grand jury room will disrupt its proceedings. They argue that "lawyers will lawyer." Yet, under the Association's proposal, the lawyer's role would be stringently limited. The lawyer could only advise the client, not take part in the proceedings. The lawyer may be present only while the client is testifying. The court could order the removal of a disruptive counsel.

Attorney General Bell has asserted that "minitrials" will result if lawyers sit with their clients in the grand jury. The facts, however, speak otherwise. Practitioners, prosecutors, and judges in the states that already allow this practice report no problems. Lawyers attend many proceedings and quietly sit by and advise their clients without trying to take over the session. Mr. Bell's view reveals little faith in members of the bar. Lawyers are fully capable of restrained, professional conduct in handling these proceedings.

The attorney general also has claimed that this proposal constitutes a "Lawyers' Relief Act." This argument, while good rhetoric, is baffling: whether the lawyer is sitting outside the grand jury room door or inside beside the client, how is the number of lawyers involved changed?

Opponents raise other arguments as well. They claim that a breach in the secrecy rule will result. According to Acting Deputy Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti, letting the attorney into the grand jury room would constitute "an additional source of leaks." This argument sounds good, for who could oppose preservation of grand jury secrecy? But it is poorly based. Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure specifies that a witness can tell his attorney everything that occurred during his appearance. The lawyer would hear nothing that his client is not already free to tell him.

Critics also maintain that the presence of the witness's lawyer will restrict free testimony in cases involving political corruption, organized crime, and complex economic crime. But the states that already allow counsel into the grand jury chamber in most instances have retained the grand jury as an investigatory body for precisely these kinds of investigations. There are alternate ways of securing a co-operative witness's statement. Evidence can be summarized for the grand jury in the form of hearsay, under Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956). As experienced prosecutors know, very few witnesses decide to co-operate without their lawyer's knowledge. If the witness's testimony is helpful to the government, that fact will quickly become evident to the attorney from the amount of time spent in the grand jury room.

To meet one well-based concern, the Association's recommendations contain a strong statement on multiple representation of witnesses. Recognizing that problems arising from multiple representation could be exacerbated by allowing counsel into the grand jury room, the proposals contain a principle providing that a lawyer should not continue multiple representation in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of his independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his representation of another. If the court determines that this principle is not being followed, it would have the authority to order separate representation.

Back in the twelfth century, perhaps, or in eighteenth century America, when grand jurors were the witness's neighbors, the body traditionally served as the witness's protectors. Law was simple then and in many instances not committed to writing. Most citizens who served on a grand jury lived and died in the same community; they knew their neighbors. But today the modern investigatory grand jury is an arm of the prosecution. Laws are complex, and even the most assertive lay grand juror is to some degree intimidated by the professionalism, expertise, and authority of the prosecutor. It is naïve to assume that grand jurors still fulfill their original role, although this is a convenient argument for defenders of the present system.

The background of the Association's grand jury reform proposals explains their sound basis and practical nature. The Criminal Justice Section's Committee on the Grand Jury, which worked for about three years on the draft, reflected the section's "umbrella" makeup. It included prosecutors, defense counsel, law professors, and judges, most of whom had extensive prosecutorial experience. The committee included Charles Ruff; one of the original Watergate prosecutors, Seymour Glanzer; and the former district attorney of Manhattan, Richard Kuh.

Prospects for congressional action on grand jury legislation appear to be improved. Congress has been looking into charges of grand jury abuse since 1973. Both House and Senate judiciary subcommittees have held extensive hearings. In the House Joshua Eilberg, Democrat of Pennsylvania, and John Conyers, Democrat of Michigan, have sponsored bills, as has James Abourezk, Democrat of South Dakota, in the Senate. The committees have received testimony from a wide spectrum of witnesses, including federal judges and prosecutors, practicing lawyers, legal scholars, and professional groups like the National District Attorneys Association. Organizations that seek broader change, such as the Coalition against Grand Jury Abuse, have also appeared. Many provisions in the pending legislation mirror proposals contained in the Association-approved package.

Changes Being Considered

It is encouraging that many states are now considering changes in their grand jury procedures. The Department of Justice is revising the United States Attorneys Manual to spell out more specifically the proper limits of prosecutorial conduct. This is long overdue. During development of the Criminal Justice Section's recommendations, the Grand Jury Committee met with representatives of the Justice Department and successfully hammered out a number of compromises. At the House of Delegates' session in August, the department supported twenty of the principles as finally drafted.

During this year the Section of Criminal Justice will work closely with the Committee on Association Standards for Criminal Justice to prepare standards and back-up commentary on the grand jury.

Opponents of change fear that massive obstacles will be thrown up in the path of complex criminal investigations, making the job of law enforcement harder. But preservation of the grand jury's efficiency cannot be sufficient justification to allow it continued carte blanche with the rights of witnesses and of those it is investigating. Efficiency has never been the sole guiding procedural rule in our system.

Reform of grand jury procedures will help to retain the grand jury. It will help to restore it to its role as a citizens' body—one of the last ways in which laymen actually participate in our criminal justice system. It should serve as an aid to the prosecutor, but not as his lackey.

In re April 1977 Grand Jury Subpoenas No. 77-1599

The grand jury is a long-standing part of our legal tradition written into our Constitution. But it is not sacrosanct. It needs the same attention every other phase of the criminal justice process has received. As a matter of fairness, we need to revamp and rejuvenate the grand jury.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT

In Re April 1977
Grand Jury Subpoenas

GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION,
Appellant,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Appellee.

APPEAL from United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan.

Decided and Filed April 5, 1978.

Before: WEICK, CELEBREZZE and MERRITT, Circuit Judges.

WEICK, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the Court, in which CELEBREZZE, Circuit Judge, joined. MERRITT, Circuit Judge, (pp. 16-24) filed a separate dissenting opinion.

WEICK, Circuit Judge. General Motors Corporation (GM) has perfected an interlocutory appeal to this Court from an order of the District Court denying GM's motion for a protective order seeking inter alia the disqualification of Meno W. Piliaris, an Internal Revenue Service (IRS) attorney, from participating in the conduct of a grand jury proceeding investigating alleged income tax evasions by GM. GM contends that such participation by Piliaris is unlawful and creates a conflict of interest or an appearance of such a conflict.

THE FACTS

During a 1975 audit by IRS of GM's 1972 income tax returns questions arose concerning the propriety of GM's deductions from income of the cost of expense materials when purchased.[1] IRS was of the view that expense materials which were on hand and unconsumed at the end of the tax year on December 31, 1972 should have been treated as inventory; and that if such materials were treated as expenses when purchased the expense should have been decreased by the amount of expense materials on hand or unconsumed on December 31, 1972, thereby increasing the amount of taxable income. IRS requested GM to determine its inventory of expense materials as of December 31, 1975; and this figure was to be extrapolated back to 1972 to arrive at an estimated inventory for that year.

GM conducted the survey. IRS, however, questioned its accuracy. GM contends that agents of IRS began a series of visits to the plants of GM, and they berated GM employees, using abusive tactics and improper behavior. GM filed affidavits with IRS relative to this misconduct, but GM asserts that IRS made no investigation. IRS, believing that GM employees had falsified the survey, stopped routine audit functions and the case was referred to the Intelligence Division of IRS for an investigation to determine whether false or fraudulent statements were made to it, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001.

Special agents of the Intelligence Division made several requests for the production of records and documents. When certain records were not produced, a recommendation was made to the Justice Department that a grand jury investigation be made to determine possible violations of the criminal laws by GM.

In February 1977 such an investigation was approved. Willard McBride and Robert Forrest, attorneys from the Tax Division, Department of Justice, were appointed as special attorneys to conduct the grand jury investigation. They in turn sought the assistance of Piliaris, who was an attorney and accountant employed by the Office of Regional Counsel, Internal Revenue Service in Cincinnati, Ohio, and who was familiar with the GM income tax investigation. He had drafted the letter from the Regional Counsel to the Justice Department recommending a grand jury investigation. The letter stated that at the appropriate time IRS would request an order from the Court authorizing the disclosure of grand jury information to IRS. Piliaris also drafted a memorandum describing a meeting in which he participated and in which IRS planned its handling of the GM matter in coordination with the proposed grand jury proceedings. He was also familiar with the nature of the criminal investigation. On April 15, 1977 Piliaris was designated by Acting Associate Attorney General Modlin as a special attorney for the United States, empowered to assist in conducting the proceeding before the grand jury, although counsel admitted that he remained on the payroll of IRS.

Numerous grand jury subpoenas were served on GM and on GM employees. GM responded by filing motions to quash and for a protective order which asked the District Court to prohibit the disclosure of grand jury evidence to IRS employees. As a result of these motions the Government suspended the grand jury investigation to await the District Court's ruling on the motions. Subsequently GM learned of the contemplated use of IRS attorney Piliaris as a special attorney before the grand jury. GM then filed a motion seeking an order prohibiting Piliaris from participating in conducting the proceeding, or scrutinizing grand jury materials.

The District Court on June 30th entered orders denying GM's motions with respect to the subpoenas and the disqualification of Piliaris, and granted in part GM's motion for a protective order with regard to the disclosure of grand jury evidence to IRS agents assisting the investigation.

GM filed both a notice of appeal and a motion for a stay of the grand jury proceeding pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion for a stay; and GM immediately filed in this Court a motion to stay the grand jury proceeding. Circuit Judge Engel denied the motion for a stay on the ground that no final appealable order had been entered.

The grand jury investigation then resumed with Piliaris's active participation.

GM filed a motion requesting the District Court to amend the orders of June 30th to include a statement allowing an interlocutory appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). This motion was denied with respect to all of the Court's orders except the one denying GM's motion to disqualify Piliaris from conducting the grand jury proceeding. The District Court accordingly amended its order of June 30th so as to provide:

> The undersigned is of the opinion that this order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion, and that an immediate appeal from this order as authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) may materially advance the ultimate termination of this litigation.

This Court granted the Government's motion to dismiss GM's direct appeal of the District Court's orders on the ground that the orders were not appealable. In the same order we granted leave to GM to appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) from the order denying GM's motion to disqualify Piliaris from acting as a Government attorney in the presentation of the case before the grand jury.

II

JURISDICTION

At the outset the Government contends that we have no jurisdiction of the interlocutory appeal under Section 1292(b). It asserts that this section by its express terms applies only to civil actions, and that a grand jury investigation is a criminal proceeding and is not a civil action. The Government has not cited a single case to us which so holds. Interlocutory appeals under Section 1292(b) were allowed in the following cases: In Re Grand Jury Impaneled Jan. 21, 1975, 541 F.2d 373 (3d Cir. 1976); In Re Grand Jury Investigation, 338 F. Supp. 1379 (W.D. Pa. 1972).

A grand jury proceeding constitutes "a judicial inquiry." Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323, 327 (1940). It is a grand inquest with powers of investigation and inquisition. The function of the grand jury is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and to protect citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions. United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974), aff'g 455 F.2d 750 (6th Cir. 1972); Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390 (1962). The proceeding becomes criminal as to a defendant when the grand jury returns an indictment against him. Post v. United States, 161 U.S. 583, 587 (1896).

Merely because a witness has been subpoenaed to testify and to bring his records before a grand jury, does not involve the witness in a criminal action. If the witness refuses to answer a question on the ground that it tends to incriminate him, and the Court finds him guilty of contempt, he has the right to a direct appeal under Section 1291. In Re Grand Jury Impaneled Jan. 21, 1975, supra.

Where the witness files a motion to quash a subpoena duces tecum on Fifth Amendment grounds, the Court, instead of finding him guilty and punishing him for contempt, from which a direct appeal could be taken, may certify an interlocutory appeal under Section 1292(b). In Re Grand Jury Investigation, supra.

Even in a criminal case where a witness had been served with a subpoena duces tecum to bring his tapes and other records, and the Court denied a motion to quash, the Supreme Court held that the witness was entitled to a direct appeal from the order rather than to be subjected to a contempt charge. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974).[2] Cf. Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7 (1918) (1st Syl.).

The proceedings before the grand jury thus far have been protracted. They should not be converted into a minitrial. If we hold that GM has no right of appellate review GM and the Government could be subjected to a protracted trial and considerable unnecessary expense if an indictment results and the trial court or this Court, on review, holds that the procedure followed was unlawful. Judicial supervision should prevent a wrong before it occurs.

But we need not determine this issue anew because another panel of this Court has considered the Government's motion to dismiss GM's direct appeal under Section 1291 and GM's petition for leave to file an interlocutory appeal under Section 1292(b). The issues were fully briefed and the same contentions made by the parties before that panel are repeated here. The panel granted the Government's motion to dismiss GM's appeal and also granted GM's petition for leave to file an interlocutory appeal. GM filed its interlocutory appeal pursuant to the order of this Court. We decline to vacate the order allowing the interlocutory appeal.

[2] In the dissenting opinion filed by Circuit Judge Merritt he undertakes to distinguish Nixon on the ground that that case involved the President of the United States; but if the Appellate Court was without jurisdiction of Mr. Nixon's appeal, the fact that Mr. Nixon was President would not confer appellate jurisdiction upon the Court. Any private citizen, including GM, would be entitled to the same treatment as Mr. Nixon, and to deny that treatment would deprive the citizen of due process of law and of the equal protection of the law.

Even if the order sought to be reviewed is nonappealable under Section 1291 or under Section 1292(b), we hold that the issues presented are subject to review by mandamus, and accordingly we treat this interlocutory appeal as a petition for a writ of mandamus under the All Writs Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1651. Young Properties Corp. v. United Equity Corp., 534 F.2d 847, 854 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 830 (1976); United States v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794, 808 (5th Cir. 1975); Application of Johnson, 484 F.2d 791, 794 n.2 (7th Cir. 1973); In re Harmon, 425 F.2d 916, 918 (1st Cir. 1970); International Prods. Corp. v. Koons, 325 F.2d 403, 407 (2d Cir. 1963); International Nickel Co. v. Martin J. Barry, Inc., 204 F.2d 583, 585 (4th Cir. 1953); Shapiro v. Bonanza Hotel Co., 185 F.2d 777, 779 (9th Cir. 1950).[3]

Courts of Appeals, pursuant to their supervisory powers, may review in a mandamus proceeding questions of unusual importance necessary to the economical and efficient administration of justice. Schlangenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104 (1964); LaBuy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. 249, 259-60 (1957). See Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 107 (1967).

Such supervisory jurisdiction may arise to correct errors or abuses of discretion on the part of the District Courts in connection with grand jury proceedings. Application of Johnson, supra at 795; United States v. United States Dist. Court for the S. Dist. of W. Va., 238 F.2d 713, 719 (4th Cir. 1956); cf. United States v. Briggs, supra; Continental Oil Co. v. United States, 330 F.2d 347, 349 (9th Cir. 1964).

Clearly this is an exceptional case. If GM's assertion concerning the impropriety of Piliaris's presence before the grand jury is correct, not only will a great waste of both time and money ensue in permitting the grand jury to continue its investigation, but such waste will be substantially enlarged if an indictment is returned and GM is forced to go to trial.

[3] Despite this wealth of authority, the dissent would deny this Court its right to exercise its supervisory powers under the All Writs Act.

If this is not enough, this appeal presents important issues of first impression. As was stated in United States v. United States Dist. Court for the E. Dist. of Mich., S. Div., 444 F.2d 651, 656 (6th Cir. 1971), aff'd, 407 U.S. 297 (1972), quoting from Schlangenhauf v. Holder, supra at 110:

> The courts of appeals have the power to review by mandamus "an issue of first impression" involving a "basic undecided problem."

Cf. Thermtron Prods., Inc. v. Hermansdorfer, 423 U.S. 336, 352-53 (1976).

In United States v. King, 482 F.2d 768 (D.C. Cir. 1973), it was held:

> An accused who has been deprived of a substantial right at his preliminary hearing can seek relief by way of habeas corpus or mandamus.

III

AUTHORITY TO APPOINT SPECIAL ATTORNEYS

GM has questioned the authority of the Attorney General to appoint an administrative agency attorney such as Piliaris as a special attorney. In our opinion this authority is conferred by 28 U.S.C. §§ 515(a), 543. See H.R. Rep. No. 2901, 59th Cong., 1st Sess. 1-2 (1906); cf. Schebergen v. United States, 536 F.2d 674 (6th Cir. 1976); In re Grand Jury Subpoenas of Persico, 522 F.2d 41 (2d Cir. 1975).

Nothing precluding such an appointment is found in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Rule 6(d) of Fed. R. Crim. P. provides that "attorneys for the government" may be present during grand jury sessions. Rule 54(c) defines attorneys for the government as including "the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States Attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States Attorney . . . ." The original Advisory Committee Notes to Rules 6(d) and 54(c) indicate that they are to be read in conjunction with existing statutes, including 28 U.S.C. § 515 (a) (previously codified at 5 U.S.C. § 310). 18 U.S.C.A. annots. to Rules 6(d) and 54(c); In re Grand Jury Subpoenas of Persico, supra at 66; United States v. DiGirlomo, 393 F. Supp. 997, 1000-01 & n.2 (W.D. Mo.), aff'd 520 F.2d 372 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1033 (1975). Accordingly, special attorneys appointed pursuant to Sections 515(a) and 543 are authorized assistants of the Attorney General under Rule 54(c), and are therefore attorneys for the Government within the meaning of Rule 6(d). Little v. United States, 524 F.2d 335, 336 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 920 (1976).

IV

DISQUALIFICATION OF PILIARIS

The final question is whether Piliaris, on ethical grounds, was disqualified to conduct proceedings before the grand jury as a special attorney for the Government while remaining on the payroll of IRS.

The ABA Standards Relating to the Prosecution Function provide in material part:

> A prosecutor should avoid the appearance or reality of a conflict of interest with respect to his official duties.
>
> (Approved Draft 1971, pt. 1, Std. 1.2(a).)
>
> Commentary.
> Section 2.3(b) of these standards recommends that the offices of chief prosecutor and his assistants be full-time occupations. The commentary to that subsection points out the potential conflicts of interest which may arise from part-time devotion to the duties of public prosecutor. The instant standard complements section 2.3(b) and at the same time points out situations of likely conflicts of interest. When a conflict of interest may arise the prosecutor should rescuse himself and make appropriate arrangements for the handling of the particular matter by > other counsel in accordance with the principles of section 2.10, infra. It is of the utmost importance that the prosecutor avoid participation in a case in circumstances where any implication of partiality may cast a shadow over the integrity of his office.

Canon 9 of the Code of Professional Responsibility provides:

> A lawyer should avoid even the appearance of professional impropriety.

The evidence does not disclose anything actually unlawful on the part of Piliaris in accepting his appointment. The District Court made no findings of any actual conflict of interest. We consider only the appearance of a conflict of interest which, in our opinion, was established by the evidence in this case, and the District Court should have so found. As was stated by Chief Judge Irving R. Kaufman in General Motors Corp. v. City of New York, 501 F.2d 639, 649 (2d Cir. 1974), in which no actual impropriety was claimed:

> [W]e must act with scrupulous care to avoid any appearance of impropriety lest it taint both the public and private segments of the legal profession.

This appearance of impropriety arises by reason of the prior connection of Mr. Piliaris with the investigation by IRS of the income tax returns of GM and the recommendations in which he participated when he was serving as attorney for IRS in Cincinnati. It was Piliaris who, while acting for IRS, wrote the letter to the Department of Justice recommending the grand jury investigation of GM. Piliaris, in that letter, stated that at the appropriate time IRS would request an order from the court authorizing the disclosure of grand jury information to IRS under the provisions of Rule 6(e) of the Fed. R. Crim. P. Shortly prior to his appointment as special attorney Piliaris wrote a memorandum describing an IRS meeting which he attended, at which was planned the conduct of its own handling of the GM matter in coordination with the proposed grand jury investigation. Some IRS employees were assigned to various aspects of the investigation and IRS would defer GM's request for civil tax ruling pending the grand jury investigation.

It is clear that the Department of Justice attorneys were interested only in the criminal aspects of the case, whereas IRS was interested in the civil aspects and contemplated asking the Court to permit the use of the grand jury material in its civil matters which included GM's 1972 returns and also later returns which have not been audited.

In United States v. Proctor & Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677, 683 (1958), Mr. Justice Douglas, who wrote the opinion for the Court, spoke out against "using criminal procedures to elicit evidence in a civil case. If the prosecution were using that device, it would be flouting the policy of the law."

Congress has granted to IRS adequate powers of investigation with respect to civil matters, and it should not be necessary for IRS to conduct a grand jury investigation in order to obtain evidence for its use in civil cases. 28 U.S.C. § 7601, et seq.

GM asserts that Piliaris, in conducting the grand jury proceeding, could be interested in obtaining an indictment in order to justify the IRS recommendation to the Department of Justice for a grand jury investigation.

GM also claims that Piliaris might not be interested in investigating GM's charges of misconduct on the part of IRS agents in connection with the audit.

GM further complains about the presence of Piliaris in the secret hearings before the grand jury where it would be possible for him to have access to evidence which IRS could use in civil matters against GM, not only with respect to its tax return for 1972, but also with respect to its returns for subsequent years. Piliaris has been placed in a conflicting and intolerable position.

It should also be remembered that the function of the prosecutor, as was held in United States v. Calandra, supra, in addition to obtaining an indictment where probable cause has been shown that a crime has been committed, is also to protect citizens against unfounded criminal prosecution.

In Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390 (1962), Mr. Chief Justice Warren, writing the opinion for the Court, described the function of a grand jury with respect to its protection of the rights of citizens, in stronger terms, stating:

> Historically, this body has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive persecution; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused, whether the latter be an individual, minority group, or other, to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will.

In the present case the worry of GM is that Piliaris has an axe to grind and is more interested in justifying his previous investigations, his recommendations, and the conduct of IRS agents than in protecting GM against unfounded criminal prosecution. It is our duty to determine these important questions now, and not to await review of a possible protracted criminal trial, and not to permit the conduct of grand jury procedures for civil purposes.

In a hearing in the District Court the following exchange took place between the Court and the Government attorney:

> THE COURT: Why can't you take any Internal Revenue Service lawyer and make him a special attorney by appointment and turn the grand jury investigation over to him, let him run the whole show?
>
> MR. McBRIDE: Conceivably that could be done.
>
> THE COURT: You are saying that would be appropriate?
>
> MR. McBRIDE: Yes, your Honor, for this reason —
>
> THE COURT: I ought not be concerned with it?
> MR. McBRIDE: Again for this reason that the law, Section 515 and 543 of Title 28, does not put any limits on the authority of the attorney general. It puts him in control and GM, nor the Court, if I may be forgiven to say so, are not, I think, in a position, and GM should not be able to dictate who it will have conducting this grand jury or to assist in the conduct of this grand jury as it has also been trying to dictate who would be persons to assist the government attorneys and suggesting that we have other people.[4] [A. 261-62]

As we have held, the power of appointment resides in the Attorney General or in his designated assistant. This power of appointment does not authorize the Attorney General, or his associate, to appoint an attorney who has a conflict of interest or an appearance of a conflict, nor does it immunize such an appointment so as to prevent judicial review. The courts have jurisdiction in a proper case to decide whether such conflict or appearance of conflict exists.

In considering the advisability of the appointment of attorneys representing various administrative agencies as special attorneys to conduct grand jury proceedings, the appointing authority in the future might well look into the question of conflict of interest or the appearance of conflict, in order to obviate judicial review.

In United States v. Braniff Airways, Inc., 428 F. Supp. 579 (W.D. Tex. 1977), the District Court was faced with a somewhat similar situation. There, Burton Kolko, the former Chief of the Agreements Division of the Civil Aeronautics Board, and who had become a permanent attorney of the Anti-Trust Division of the Department of Justice, was commissioned as a special attorney to assist in and to conduct a grand jury investigation of an alleged conspiracy by certain airlines to exclude other airlines from doing business in the Southwest,

[4] It does seem to be anomalous that the attorney for the person being investigated is not permitted to appear before the grand jury and represent his client but is excluded, while here the attorney on the payroll of the Agency instigating the investigation was authorized not only to appear but also to conduct the grand jury proceeding. We do not believe it to be appropriate for either of these attorneys to appear and represent their respective clients before the grand jury.

in violation of the antitrust laws. Certain agreements between the airlines that the Government believed were a part of the alleged conspiracy, had been reviewed by Kolko while he was employed by the CAB. The District Court held that his presence in the grand jury room vitiated the indictment of Braniff. The Court stated, at 583 and 589:

> Although there may have been no intention of wrongdoing, it is indeed strange to find a former high CAB official who had passed upon many of the matters under investigation, to be present in a grand jury room where those very matters are under consideration, irrespective of the capacity in which he presented himself . . . . Whether or not Mr. Kolko was known to the grand jury as a former CAB official cannot be ascertained.
>
> Although Mr. Kolko . . . stated he expressed his surprise and chagrin in learning that one or more of the matters which he had passed upon while at the CAB were in fact under investigation by the grand jury, nothing whatever was done to rectify the situation prior to, during, or following Mr. Kolko's appearances in the grand jury room . . . . Neither Mr. Kolko, nor . . . anyone else appears to have recognized any impropriety in placing Mr. Kolko before the grand jury in this proceeding. The courts have expressed a deep concern, and rightly so, that government attorneys be subject to exacting standards which negate conflicts of interest, and more so that their conduct may not suggest even an appearance of impropriety.

> The Court is further of the opinion and so finds that the employment, assignment, and appearance as an observer or as a prosecutor of Mr. Burton S. Kolko before the grand jury under the circumstances surrounding his former employment as a Civil Aeronautics Board official, constituted him an unauthorized person in the grand jury room during proceedings held in this case, and is an independent ground sufficient to vitiate the indictment.

In American Cyanamid Co. v. FTC, 363 F.2d 757, 767 (6th Cir. 1966), this Court disqualified the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission from hearing a case because of his prior connection with it, and held that his participation in the case deprived the petitioners of due process of law, and invalidated the order under review. Circuit Judge Phillips (now Chief Judge), who wrote the opinion for the Court, stated:

> It is fundamental that both unfairness and the appearance of unfairness should be avoided. Wherever there may be reasonable suspicion of unfairness, it is best to disqualify. See Prejudice and the Administrative Process, 59 Nw.U.L.Rev. 216, 231 (1964); Disqualification of Administrative Officials for Bias, 13 Vand.L.Rev. 713, 727 (1960).
>
> It is to be emphasized that the Commission is a fact-finding body. As Chairman, Mr. Dixon sat with the other members as triers of the facts and joined in making the factual determination upon which the order of the Commission is based. As counsel for the Senate Subcommittee, he had investigated and developed many of these same facts.

Although the agency in the Cyanamid case performed quasi-judicial functions, the legal principles are the same.

Other issues are raised by GM which include the conduct by the District Judge of an in camera hearing permitting only counsel for the Government to appear and excluding counsel for GM, cf. United States v. Wind, 527 F.2d 672 (6th Cir. 1975); and also the entry of an order, copies of which were not furnished to counsel for GM. In view of our disposition of this appeal it is not necessary that we pass upon these issues.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed and the cause is remanded with instructions to terminate the grand jury investigation as invalid, and to enter necessary protective orders relative to the use of the grand jury information.

JUDGE MERRITT, Dissenting. The majority has concluded that this case is now ripe for review and, reaching the merits, that the Attorney General's appointment of an IRS lawyer to conduct a Grand Jury investigation of General Motors in Detroit is unethical under the ABA Code of Professional Responsibility. I disagree with both conclusions.

I. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

In February, 1977, the Department of Justice approved the convening of a special federal grand jury in Detroit to investigate possible criminal tax violations by General Motors. On April 15, 1977, the Attorney General appointed an IRS lawyer to assist Justice Department lawyers in conducting the grand jury inquiry. General Motors moved to disqualify the IRS lawyer from participation in the grand jury proceedings on the grounds that public policy considerations and conflict-of-interest principles of the legal profession prohibit such participation by IRS lawyers who have previously participated in a civil tax investigation of the taxpayer.

Finding that the Attorney General's action is specifically authorized by statute, 28 U.S.C. §§ 515, 543 (1970), the District Judge overruled General Motors' motion to disqualify but certified the issue to us under the Interlocutory Appeals Act of 1958, 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1970) as a "controlling question" – apparently on the ground that, if the District Court's ruling were later found to be erroneous, the presence of an IRS lawyer in the grand jury room might void any indictment returned by the grand jury against General Motors or its officials. General Motors pursued its appeal to this Court under the Interlocutory Appeals Act, and it also appealed under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, treating the order as a "final decision" for purposes of review. General Motors did not file an application for mandamus against the District Judge.

The government then moved to dismiss both appeals, the § 1291 appeal on the grounds that the lower court order

overruling General Motors' motion to disqualify was interlocutory and not final, and the § 1292(b) interlocutory appeal on the grounds that such piecemeal appeals are not allowed in criminal cases. A panel of this Court consisting of Judges Weick, Edwards and Celebrezze entered an order on October 3, 1977, dismissing General Motors' § 1291 appeal but granting General Motors leave to proceed under § 1292(b).[1]

II. THE QUESTION OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The District Court's order is not reviewable under the Interlocutory Appeals Act, or as a final decision under § 1291 or on mandamus.

The Interlocutory Appeals Act of 1958 authorizes an appeal of an interim or non-final decision "in a civil action" upon a certification by the District Judge that his decision raises a "controlling question of law as to which there is substantial grounds for difference of opinion," the decision of which "may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." The statute in question establishes the right of interlocutory appeal in civil cases but it extinguishes that right in criminal cases. General Motors' appeal in this case should be characterized as a criminal and not a civil appeal and, therefore, we lack jurisdiction under the Interlocutory Appeals Act.

Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323 (1940) strongly supports the view that this case is a criminal rather than civil appeal and therefore is not reviewable under the Interlocutory Appeals Act or § 1291. There, the Supreme Court decided that a District Court order overruling a motion to quash a grand jury subpoena was not a final appealable order

[1] The question arose on the Court's weekly Administrative or Motion Docket and was decided without oral argument or regular conference consideration. We are not bound by the first panel's decision. See Messenger v. Anderson, 225 U.S. 436, 444 (1912); Petition of United States Steel Corporation, 474 F.2d 489, 494 (6th Cir. 1973); Potomac Passengers Association v. Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co., 520 F.2d 91, 95 n. 22 (D.C. Cir. 1975); 1B Moore, Federal Practice § 0.404.

under § 1291. Holding that a grand jury proceeding is part of the criminal process, the Supreme Court based its ruling on the historic principle of judicial administration "forbidding piecemeal disposition" and "separate review of the component elements" of criminal cases. The principle is designed to conserve judicial time and prevent delaying tactics in criminal proceedings. Noting that the Fifth Amendment makes the grand jury a necessary part of the criminal process, Justice Frankfurter, writing for the Court, explained that "it is no less important to safeguard against undue interruption the inquiry instituted by a grand jury than to protect from delay the progress of the trial after an indictment has been found."

In U.S. v. Ryan, 402 U.S. 530 (1971) the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed the holding of Cobbledick and the principles on which it is based, observing that non-compliance resulting in a contempt citation is the only way to obtain review of such a grand jury question in advance of indictment and trial:

> [W]e have consistently held that the necessity for expedition in the administration of the criminal law justifies putting one who seeks to resist the production of desired information to a choice between compliance with a trial court's order to produce prior to any review of that order, and resistance to that order with the concomitant possibility of an adjudication of contempt if his claims are rejected on appeal. Id. at 532-33.

General Motors as the target of the Grand Jury investigation has the same appellate remedies that were available in Ryan. It can raise the disqualification of counsel issue after indictment and conviction, the normal course of review in criminal cases, or it can refuse to obey grand jury subpoenas on this ground and appeal a contempt citation. These are the usual remedies, and they are adequate.[2]

[2] Compare the civil cases on the subject of interlocutory appellate review of orders denying disqualification of counsel, discussed in a case note in 30 Vand.L.Rev. 259 (1977), written by Sara Porter Walsh.

Justice Frankfurter in Cobbledick and Justice Brennan in Ryan apply these principles of appellate review in order to prevent piecemeal appeals from grand jury activity under § 1291, but the Interlocutory Appeals Act, passed eighteen years after the Cobbledick decision, is based on the same set of principles forbidding piecemeal consideration of criminal cases. The Act limits interim review of "a controlling question of law" to civil cases only and, therefore, should not be read to allow piecemeal review of grand jury activity.

It is true, as the majority opinion suggests, that the Supreme Court made an exception to the Cobbledick-Ryan principle in the Nixon Tapes case, characterizing as a "final, appealable order" Judge Sirica's denial of the President's motion to quash the subpoena duces tecum, an order that in other circumstances would not be considered "final" under § 1291. After reaffirming Cobbledick and Ryan, the Court states the reason for making an exception in that case:

> [T]he traditional contempt avenue to immediate appeal is peculiarly inappropriate due to the unique setting in which the question arises. To require a President of the United States to place himself in the posture of disobeying an order of a court merely to trigger the procedural mechanism for review of the ruling would be unseemly, and would present an unnecessary occasion for constitutional confrontation between two branches of the Government. Similarly, a federal judge should not be placed in the posture of issuing a citation to a President simply in order to invoke review.
> U.S. v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 691-92 (1974).

The Nixon case is, therefore, distinguishable, unless we think that General Motors is in the same position as the President and cannot be investigated by a grand jury without causing a "constitutional confrontation."

Nor should we review this case on mandamus. General Motors has not applied for a writ of mandamus against the District Judge, and the principles discussed in Cobbledick and Ryan apply in double measure to the use of the extraordinary remedy of mandamus as a means of piecemeal review in criminal cases. Reasoning that mandamus may only be used in "exceptional circumstances amounting to a judicial usurpation of power," the Court in United States v. Will, 389 U.S. 90 (1967) rejected the government's mandamus action to compel a district judge to limit pretrial discovery in a criminal case, adding that "this general policy against piecemeal appeals [by mandamus] takes on added weight in criminal cases." Id. at 95.

The district judge below has handled General Motors' claim with deliberation, patience and forbearance, in my opinion, and is not guilty of "judicial usurpation."

III. THE CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST QUESTION

The Court holds that the IRS lawyer is disqualified under Canon 9 of the ABA Code of Professional Responsibility after conceding that the Attorney General appointed the lawyer in accordance with specific statutory authority granting him the power to appoint a lawyer to represent the government for a particular case or grand jury investigation. Canon 9 provides that "a lawyer should avoid even the appearance of professional impropriety."

In this case the lawyer has not accepted new employment that either creates a conflict of interest or creates the appearance of a conflict of interest. There is no conflict of interest between the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service. If the lawyer had left General Motors to participate in the grand jury proceedings, General Motors would be entitled to have the lawyer disqualified on grounds of conflict of interest. In tax cases, however, the investigative arm of the government, the IRS, and the litigative arm, the Department of Justice, must exchange information; and they may also exchange the people in the departments who have the information.

In a civil tax investigation of General Motors, the IRS uncovered information which led it to suspect criminal tax fraud. It gave the information to the Justice Department which initiated a grand jury investigation and deputized an IRS lawyer familiar with the facts so that he could participate in the grand jury investigation – a natural, not a sinister, sequence of events.

Here the majority seems to have confused the demands of the canons of ethics of lawyers with the code of conduct of judges. In its opinion, the majority relies upon two cases, American Cyanamid Co. v. FTC, 363 F.2d 757 (6th Cir. 1966), and United States v. Braniff Airways, Inc., 428 F. Supp. 579 (W.D. Tex. 1977). In American Cyanamid this Court on due process grounds overturned a decision of the FTC because one of the judges participating in the decision had conducted a legislative investigation of the same facts while serving as chief counsel of a Senate Subcommittee. We must recognize, however, that while litigants are entitled to an impartial tribunal, as in that case, they may not demand a neutral prosecutor, as in this case. A judge should disqualify himself from a case he participated in as a lawyer, but a prosecutor need not disqualify himself because he has previously conducted other investigations of the same suspect, whether for the same or a different governmental agency. The court in this case conflates these two separate principles which draw a distinction between judges and prosecutors; but the court is not alone in its confusion, for in the other case cited, the Braniff Airways case, the district judge there made the same mistake when he barred a Justice Department anti-trust lawyer, formerly employed by the Civil Aeronautics Board, from conducting a grand jury investigation of alleged anti-trust violations by Braniff.

IV. CONCLUSION

In light of the above discussion, I would conclude that neither appellate jurisdiction nor a conflict of interest exists in this case. In addition, both conclusions are strongly supported by the most recent amendment to Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure[3] governing the use of evidence developed by a grand jury. The stated reasons for the amendment neatly tie together both of the issues presented by this case and prove to me that Congress did not think that this situation creates a conflict of interest or that the proceedings of the grand jury should be interrupted by interlocutory appeals.

1. Exchange of Grand Jury Information. Under the new Rule 6(e), most grand jury proceedings may be disclosed to "an attorney for the government" or "to such governmental personnel as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the government to assist an attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law." Under the old rule, disclosure could be made only to "attorneys for the government," but not to other "government personnel."

The Senate Report on the proposed amendment states that the purpose of the change is to facilitate the kind of intra-government cooperation which occurred in this case and to enable federal prosecutors in grand jury proceedings to benefit from the expertise of agents from other departments and agencies of government:

> Attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties with a grand jury must possess the authority to utilize the services of other government employees. Federal crimes are "investigated" by the FBI, by the IRS, or by Treasury agents and not by government prosecutors or the citizens who sit on grand juries. Federal agents gather and present information relating to criminal behavior to prosecutors who analyze and evaluate it and present it to grand juries. Often the prosecutors need the assistance of the agents in evaluating evidence. Also, if further investigation is required during or after grand jury proceedings, or even during the course of criminal trials, the Federal agents must do it. There is no reason for a barrier of secrecy to exist between the facets of the criminal justice system upon which we all depend to enforce the criminal laws. Sen. Rep. No. 95-354, 95th Cong., 1st Sess., July 20, 1977, reprinted in U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News Vol. 7A (Aug. 1977), p. 1480 (emphasis added).

[3] P.L. 95-78, 95th Cong., 1st Sess., 91 Stat. 391 (1977).

The Senate Report goes on to say that there is "no intent to preclude the use of grand-jury developed evidence for civil law enforcement purposes. On the contrary, there is no reason why such use is improper, assuming that the grand jury was utilized for the legitimate purpose of criminal investigation." Id. at 1482. There is no showing in this case, and no finding by the Court below, that the government is using the grand jury for impermissible purposes or that the exchange of information or employees between the IRS and the Justice Department is improper.

2. Interlocutory Review of Grand Jury Proceedings. The old Rule 6(e), according to the Senate Report, had created a "state of uncertainty" and was "spawning some judicial decisions highly restrictive of the use of government experts" and other decisions "that make Rule 6(e) orders subject to interlocutory appeal." Id. at 1480. The Report suggests that such appeals should not be allowed for the reasons given by Justice Frankfurter in the Cobbledick decision and quotes the following language from that opinion: "It is no less important to safeguard against undue interruption the inquiry instituted by a grand jury than to protect from delay the progress of the trial after an indictment has been found." 309 U.S. at 327.

Thus, in amending Rule 6(e), Congress has once again adhered to the historic principle disallowing piecemeal review of criminal cases, just as it did when it passed the Interlocutory Appeals Act of 1958.

THE COURT: I would have much preferred to have prepared and filed a written opinion but I know that it wouldn't have been done yet. By giving the Court's opinon orally I am doing two things, it enables me not to spend a lot of time on citations and the like because I know that you gentlemen, whatever you do with this will be able to handle that aspect of it very nicely without the citations.

Secondly, it puts a deadline or time limit which doesn't change the result it just perhaps brings the result on a little bit quicker.

In any event—when a lawyer receives the judge's opinion in the mail the lawyer typically reads the last paragraph first and then digests the opinion as to why the judge was right or wrong, as the case may be. In a moment I will figuratively read the last paragraph then explain the reasons for it. First, however, there are some comments on the nature of the proceedings that seem appropriate.

To put it mildly the government has argued that it has been inappropriate for General Motors to call upon the Court for protection in this situation. In my view the motions in this case raise several issues worthy of scrutiny not only in this court but eventually in this or in other cases, certainly in higher tribunals as well.

The potential for abuse of federal grand jury process by federal prosecutors is enormous. There are three sources of protection against such abuse. Foremost, theoretically, are the citizens of the grand jury themselves. Foremost, in practice, are the attorneys for the government exercising self-restraint and guided by good conscience.

The last line of defense against grand jury abuse is the federal judiciary with the ultimate authority to do whatever is necessary. One other generalization seems appropriate. If indeed the good conscience and self restraint of the government prosecutors is in fact the main line of defense against abuse of the grand jury process, and I don't know any prosecutor that will deny it, then the more willingly the decision-making process is surrendered or shared with others the less protective will be their self restraint.

In these proceedings General Motors challenges the validity of a concept identified as the open ended grand jury investigation. The General Motors approach has been to examine the process as a whole, point out its defects and then condemn it generally, conceding that General Motors and others similarly situated are not beyond the grand jury investigation if properly conceived and conducted.

The government responds that the procedure being followed is proper and correct in all respects and asks the Court to deny all requested relief.

Now for the bottom line. For reasons which will be explained in detail the Court will deny the motion to quash the subpoenas but it will grant the motion in part for a protective order. Specifically the Court determines that attorneys for the government may not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury to agency personnel except for technical assistance and then only as specifically authorized by the Court.

The government must establish the necessity for assistance of each individual involved and that showing may be by ex parte petition. The order of authorization if granted will be an ex parte order. Prior involvement in the criminal or civil investigation will not bar an individual from access to grand jury evidence if there is sufficient showing of necessity. The order will prohibit the disclosure of grand jury evidence or summaries thereof to top level Internal Revenue Service personnel for recommendation with respect to indictment.

Finally, the motion to deny Attorney Piliaris access to the grand jury as an attorney for the government will be denied.

I will now turn to the reason for these rulings:

General Motors' motion to quash the grand jury subpoena is in effect a motion to block the grand jury investigation. General Motors complains about Internal Revenue Service involvement in four stages of the grand jury procedure.

The first stage involves the decision to conduct a grand jury investigation and the planning therefor.

The second stage is the evidence-gathering state.

The third stage involves analysis of the evidence and a decision as to what indictments, if any, to seek.

The final stage involves the dissemination of grand jury evidence for agency use.

In connection with the first stage, that is the decision to conduct a grand jury investigation and the planning which has gone into it. We are looking at what has occurred. If something illegal or fundamentally unfair has occurred which necessarily taints the remaining procedure then an appropriate remedy may be to quash the subpoenas. If nothing illegal or fundamentally wrong has occurred up to this time, but if it appears something illegal or improper is likely to occur in connection with subsequent proceedings, then the appropriate remedy is to fashion a protective order to fit the circumstances rather than to quash the subpoena.

The Justice Department may then decide to proceed within the framework of the Court's protective order or seek appellate relief therefrom or perhaps both. The Court can find no legal, technical reasons why the grand jury should be prohibited from proceeding.

General Motors complains that IRS personnel have acted rudely and in concert to create an appearance that ordinary IRS statutory investigative procedures will not be effective and that a grand jury investigation is necessary. Perhaps this allegation is true but if it is true it is not controlling. There are no applicable exhaustion of remedies requirements. There are no legal conditions precedent to a grand jury investigation. The decision to ask a grand jury to investigate possible violations of federal criminal statutes is an executive decision; it's an executive prerogative pure and simple.

Apart from technical considerations [and] precedent are there any reasons founded on fundamental fairness why the Court should in this instance intervene and stop the investigation? General Motors complains about the obviously heavy Internal Revenue Service input into the planning stages of the investigation. This in no way violates the principal of grand jury secrecy and grand jury independence.

Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure embodies the viable law concerning grand jury secrecy. The secrecy rule applies only with respect to matters which occur before the grand jury. Grand jury independence means independence of inquiry and independence of action.

No amount of communication, advice, or recommendation flowing from agency personnel to attorneys for the government or even in the other direction prior to convening of a grand jury could possibly violate the principles of grand jury secrecy or independence. There is nothing fundamentally wrong or evil with the Justice Department attorneys seeking advice from an Internal Revenue Service personnel with respect to what to look for, whom to subpoena, what documents to subpoena, what questions to ask and the like.

There isn't even a legal reason why such communications should not continue after the grand jury is convened but there is a substantial risk of inadvertent or intentional disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury in such case and there is the very real risk of the appearance of impropriety.

Are there any other reasons why the Court should not allow its process to be used? The Court's authority and responsibility to prevent the awesome power of the grand jury investigation from being abused is well established and the Court is not limited by any previously established definitions of grand jury abuse.

If some new scheme of abuse of grand jury investigative power evolves the Court must develop appropriate responses.

It was something like pulling teeth but in response to the Court's questions during oral arguments the government did virtually concede that it would be an abuse of grand jury process to conduct a grand jury investigation under the guise of a criminal investigation when the sole or even primary purpose thereof was to gather evidence for civil purposes.

I express absolutely no opinion with respect to the merits of possible criminal charges against General Motors and others. The record before the Court, however, is sufficient to support the government's claim that one good faith purpose of grand jury proceedings will be to investigate possible criminal acts.

Even the affidavit of Mr. John Olsewski, and I'm sure I didn't pronounce the name correctly, it's spelled O-l-s-e-w-s-k-i, filed by General Motors supports this conclusion. Paragraph 11 of his affidavit he said, and I quote:

> "Finally, my review of the grand jury subpoena indicates to me that they were intended to provide the government with a base of information and data for use in the determination of the criminal tax issues and ultimately the civil liabilities of General Motors."

By the nature of the case most of the evidence that will be relevant in a criminal investigation may, depending upon the ultimate resolution of complex issues of income tax law, be relevant to civil tax liability determination as well.

If the grand jury investigation produces evidence of criminal violation it's not unlikely that the same evidence would be a treasure trove of valuable tax data. The evidence is convincing that the Internal Revenue Service has already concluded that it will eventually seek to obtain grand jury evidence for use in connection with civil tax liability determination unless by the time it may be available the tax liability issues have been resolved.

The record is replete with evidence from which this might be inferred but it is not necessary to rely on the inference. In a letter dated December 23, 1976 from Gerald Fuller, Assistant Regional Counsel to Myron C. Baum, Acting Assistant Attorney General, Tax Division, Department of Justice, setting forth the formal request for an open ended grand jury investigation, Mr. Fuller says, and I am quoting directly from the letter:

> "At the appropriate time we will —"

I'll start over.

> "At the appropriate time we will request that an order be sought from the Court authorizing the disclosure of grand jury information to IRS under the provisions of Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure."

During oral argument Mr. McBride, speaking for the government suggested this was standard or form language that should perhaps be changed. If it is standard or form language it is also standard or form intent. Changing the language may change the evidence in some future case but it won't necessarily change the intent.

Distinguishing for a moment between intention and motivation, it is interesting, but ultimately fruitless to speculate upon the extent of the IRS and Justice Department dual motivation for seeking and agreeing to a grand jury investigation. Whatever the motivations there is no evidence that the Justice Department in this case plans or intends to use the grand jury subpoenas to gather evidence not relating to its criminal investigation.

If in fact it did so and it became known this would provide General Motors with a powerful argument why the Court ought not to authorize the use of any evidence for agency purposes when the criminal proceedings, if any, are complete.

In the final analysis General Motors and its employees and others similarly situated have no immunity from investigation. To quash the grand jury subpoenas because of government, because government people envision civil benefit from a criminal investigation would amount to a grant of such immunity. For these reasons the motion to quash the grand jury subpoenas will be denied.

Now this brings us to issues involving protective orders or supervisory control over the disclosure of grand jury evidence during the evidence-gathering stage.

Rule 6(e) by its language provides for disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury only to jurors, interpreters, stenographers, operators of recording devices, typists and attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties. There is no direct authorization for disclosure of grand jury evidence by attorneys for the government to police or agency personnel.

There is ample precedent in the case law for this to be done and there is nothing gained from extended discussion. The clear reason the courts have permitted disclosure by attorneys for the government to police and agency personnel is the necessity for such disclosure if a grand jury investigation is to proceed in an effective manner. The trend of decision is too well established for a district court to resist, notwithstanding that the Sixth Circuit precedent therefor is very sketchy.

One aspect of any kind of such disclosure troubles me. There is much dicta that persons such as police and agency personnel, who received grand jury evidence from attorneys for the government are subject to contempt if they make unauthorized disclosures, but there is no real authority to support the dicta. Notwithstanding this problem, it is my opinion that attorneys for the government may disclose grand jury evidence to police agencies and administrative agency personnel as well.

Who determines necessity — the attorneys for the government or the court? The government takes the position that they are under no compulsion to seek court approval. If ever there was a type of case that should require prior court approval it is such as [sic] case as this.

In my opinion Judge Becker was correct when, in the Hawthorne case — I won't bother with the citation here the lawyers know what the Hawthorne case is, at page 1126, he said, and I quote relevant language therefrom:

> "We believe that 6(e) orders should be applied for whenever the technical assistance of the IRS or a similarly situated agency outside of the Justice Department, such as the Securities Exchange Commission, is to be utilized in connection with a grand jury investigation, with the exception of cases where the assistance is of minor proportions or the single instance variety, such as, utilization of Postal Service or Secret Service expertise in obtaining and evaluating handwriting exemplars or other identification material.
> "Moreover, we do not impart to 'technical assistance' a meaning which would subsume routine investigation by an FBI agent, for example, in support of a grand jury investigation. The classical case for the application of 6(e) orders is the IRS or SEC case, or in some instances the Postal Service, Customs, or Secret Service case, where the agency has continuing regulatory or oversight responsibility with respect to the activities of an individual or corporation, and the use and retention of grand jury material beyond the aegis of the U. S. Attorney would breach the secrecy of the grand jury and pervert the grand jury process."

I just simply agree with Judge Becker in that respect.

The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit have wrested with the same problems, producing inconsistent decisions. I won't cite the cases now the lawyers are well acquainted with them. If there is a discernible trend in these decisions it is this: The courts are backing off from the original free hand to the government and are requiring particularized prior approval by the court in appropriate cases.

In this case a protective order will enter prohibiting disclosure of grand jury evidence by attorneys for the government to Internal Revenue Service personnel except as authorized by the Court. Such an order may be obtained, if at all, in a non-adversary, ex parte proceedings. The disclosure will be authorized only as shown to be necessary on a person-to-person basis. The disclosure will be for technical assistance only. Technical assistance does not include advice of agency personnel as to what indictments, if any, to seek.

Because the Court's order will be ex parte, General Motors is not entitled to be informed of the names of the persons, if any, to whom disclosure will be authorized. It is the Court's determination that prior involvement in a criminal and/or civil investigation does not disqualify the agency personnel from participation as technical assistants.

In this particular case, the in camera disclosure made by the government to the Court in practical effect gives the Court sufficient information upon which to make a decision. As a matter of principle, however, it is, in my view, more appropriate that a petition for such an order be sworn to by one or more of the attorneys for the government. In this case, the government may either submit a sworn petition summarizing the need for disclosure to agency personnel or, if the government deems appropriate, file a generalized affidavit adopting as true the unsworn disclosures already made to the Court on the record.

In either event the government should prepare for the Court's consideration, a proposed form of order specifying the individuals who they believe should be designated on an authorization for approval, rejection or modification by the Court.

A sub-issue has been suggested. There is some case authority that suggests this: Should the technical assistants be sworn as witnesses? Should they be required to take some form of special oath before the Court? I don't think it means anything for them to be grand jury witnesses unless they testify. The rule of grand jury secrecy does not apply to witnesses. The Court will not participate in any special oath-giving ceremony as has been suggested because Rule 6(e) contains the following unambiguous language, and I am quoting:

> "No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule."

I don't have it written down but to bring a witness in here, frankly, I believe would be a violation of that rule.

Let's turn our attention to the third stage of proposed IRS involvement in the grand jury investigation. By way of repetition this stage involves analysis of the evidence and the decision as to what indictment, if any, to seek. It is apparently basic to the government's concept of an open ended grand jury that selected agency, that is IRS, personnel working with attorneys for the government--correction—that agency personnel working with attorneys for the government summarize the evidence, which summaries are then used to seek the advice of high-level IRS personnel as to what indictments, if any, to ask the grand jury to return.

At some prior stage of the proceedings in this court I have expressed real concern about the authority for such a step because it would constitute a disclosure, in summary form, of matters occurring before the grand jury. Apparently as a direct result of my expressed concern the government has furnished to the Court the following letters:

This is a letter direct to me from the Department of Justice signed by Mr. Baum, the Acting Assistant Attorney General dated June 20, a copy of this was furnished to General Motors. Well, it's just a transmittal letter. I won't read the whole detail of it because it doesn't mean anything to the group here generally and General Motors already has a copy of the letter but it is a transmittal letter explaining to me that another letter of some substance is in effect.

This other letter is written under the name of Myron C. Baum, Acting Assistant Attorney General of the Tax Division and it's to an Honorable Leon G. Wigrizer, Acting Chief Counsel of the Internal Revenue Service in Washington and refers to General Motors in Detroit. This is the substance of the letter:

> "This refers to our letter dated April 1, relative to the conditions under which grand jury material would be disclosed to the Internal Revenue Service in this matter. This further refers to a meeting of this date between certain Tax Division, Department of Justice personnel and several Internal Revenue Service officials in which a further discussion was had with respect to the examination of grand jury material in the above matter."

Then there is some reference to paragraphs in the previous letter and a certain paragraph has been replaced with the following items:

> "No disclosure of grand jury material will be made to Internal Revenue Service personnel for other than for criminal purposes and then only to those personnel specifically identified by name and the office to which he or she is assigned, such disclosure to be for the purpose of assisting government attorneys in their duties or in assisting the Department of Justice in arriving at a final decision as to whether or not to seek an indictment.
>
> "Two attorneys from the Regional Counsel's office, to be identified, will be permitted to examine grand jury material at or near the conclusion of the grand jury investigation. Such attorneys will then submit their views or recommendations to the Tax Division, Department of Justice, favorable or unfavorable, which will be in addition to a report the Department of Justice attorneys and the United States Attorney's office will submit to the Tax Division. Upon receiving these reports and recommendations, the Department of Justice will, after review, make a final determination as to whether or not to seek an indictment.
>
> "All Internal Revenue Service personnel, including the two Regional Counsel attorneys, will be brought before a federal judge in open court and take an appropriate oath to keep grand jury information inviolate.
>
> "The review of grand jury material by the Regional Counsel attorneys will be conducted in Detroit under the aegis of the attorneys for the government. The report of the Regional Counsel attorneys, together with all copies and workpapers, will be submitted to the Tax Division, Department of Justice. No copies of the report will go to anyone in Internal Revenue Service except for those IRS personnel so identified. No grand jury information will be made available to Internal Revenue Service without authority of the Court."

and then it's signed.

I respectfully suggest that the security arrangements on that are very good and I am not concerned at all that there would be an unauthorized further disclosure to other IRS people under those security arrangements.

However, getting back to what I have written here: There are apparently well-established traditions that the Justice Department undertake no criminal prosecutions for violation of income tax related laws without the advice and recommendation or perhaps even approval of the Internal Revenue Service, and there are apparently policy reasons for this.

There are non-technical or discretionary reasons and there are legal or technical reasons why this procedure can not be approved if disclosure of grand jury evidence is involved. The non-technical or discretionary reasons may be summarized as follows:

The danger is real that Internal Revenue Service people will be influenced by civil considerations. Prohibiting this type of disclosure appears to be one way of restricting a potentially mushrooming growth of the so-called open-ended grand jury investigation in IRS cases with all its inherent dangers and potential for abuse, without restricting the government's ability to detect and prosecute crime.

That is a subjective thing and it's my view, and it's not controlling in any event because if such disclosure from a policy point of view were totally desirable it is clearly not authorized by Rule 6(e) and the incorporated applicable definition of attorneys for the government. The courts have based an exception to the language of the rule in the technical assistance situation. This exception—I already discussed that in some detail—this exception, as previously pointed out, is based on necessity.

Here there is no necessity. Policy is not the equivalent of necessity. Justice Department attorneys, U. S. Attorneys and their assistants, are able to make the critical decision as to whether to seek criminal indictments with respect to every other imaginable situation. It's unclear why they would need IRS input in this situation.

It is for these reasons that this Court will not contribute to the creation of a new exception to the rules and principles of grand jury secrecy and independence as the government, in effect, is asking it to do. The protective order to be issued will prohibit this type of disclosure. Fortunately, the government will have time to seek appellate review of the Court's decision in this respect before it becomes critical because the grand jury investigation, if they elect to investigate under the other conditions imposed by the Court and they are certainly unduly restrictive, can proceed.

The final stage of IRS involvement in the grand jury proceeding involves ultimate disclosure for civil purposes. The Court is not called upon to make any decision in this respect at this time. I will comment, however, that the attorneys for the government and Internal Revenue Service have apparently taken all reasonable steps to avoid breach of grand jury secrecy and security and the disclosure of grand jury evidence to Internal Revenue Service personnel except as specifically authorized by the Court.

There will be a lot of people involved if this thing goes forward and a lot of IRS people and I don't for a moment suggest security will ever be perfect. I am commenting off the written record but the track record in this country and perhaps in this community for grand jury secrecy hasn't been very good but in this case the attorneys for the government have recognized that and have planned for it and I can't fault their efforts if they go forward with the plans to maintain security and secrecy. The breaches they laid right out and said, "This is what we intend to do" and those are the things I am trying to control in the order.

I have saved for final treatment the Piliaris issue because it is, in my view, perhaps the most difficult of all. General Motors has no more right to select its adversary's counsel than does the government, and there is nothing fundamentally wrong or illegal about the assignment of personnel, including attorneys, between departments. It would be a violation of Rule 6(e) for the government to have attorneys other than attorneys for the government, as that term is defined in Rule 43(c) within the grand jury room.

If Mr. Piliaris is in the grand jury room as the eyes, ears, and voice of the Internal Revenue Service, then the rule would be violated. If this is subsequently established, it may taint the entire grand jury process, invalidate any indictments that are returned, and destroy any expectation of obtaining a later 6(e) order for use of evidence for civil purposes. If he is in the jury room functioning solely as an attorney for the government, relying only on this experience with the IRS, I can see nothing wrong with his participation.

The government has been pointedly warned about using grand jury, about using the grand jury to gather evidence not relevant to crime, and perhaps his experience in this respect will be useful to the government.

The Court will deny the General Motors motion with respect to him, and the government may proceed at its own risk.

Now there is before the Court for consideration a motion to quash a subpoena directed to Mr. William A. Schumacher. I read the briefs and heard the very careful arguments that were presented in that matter yesterday. I don't think that there is anything else need to be said. The order in that respect, the protective order that I am making in the General Motors case will have for all practical purposes such protection with respect to Mr.

Schumacher or any other witnesses as may be appropriate and there is no apparent need, certainly I am not going to quash the subpoena, so the motion of Mr. Schumacher is denied for the reasons set forth and, that's it, gentlemen.

MR. VAN DAM: Thank you, your Honor.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

The motion of General Motors Corporation to amend certain orders entered June 30, 1977, the briefs in support thereof, and the government's opposition brief have been carefully considered.

It is the opinion of the Court that a recent amendment to Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure has effectively caused to be moot as controlling questions of law as to which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion the Court's PROTECTIVE ORDER and the Court's ORDER DENYING MOTION TO QUASH SUBPOENAS.

It does not appear that such amendment affects who may be present in the grand jury room. It is the Court's opinion that the ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR PROTECTIVE ORDER RE MENO W. PILIARIS does involve a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion.

If it is ultimately determined that it is improper for Meno W. Piliaris to be present while the grand jury is in session, then there will be a very substantial waste of time and resources by General Motors Corporation, the government, and grand jurors themselves.

For the foregoing reasons, an order will be entered amending the order entered June 30, 1977, originally entitled ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR PROTECTIVE ORDER RE MENO W. PILIARIS, as prayed; and an order will be made denying the motion to amend the other two orders referred to in General Motors' motion.

AMENDED ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR PROTECTIVE ORDER RE MENO W. PILIARIS

At a session of said court held in the Federal Building and U. S. Courthouse, Detroit, Michigan, on August 23, 1977.

Present: HONORABLE JAMES P. CHURCHILL
United States District Judge

For reasons set forth on the record in open court on June 28, 1977, and for reasons set forth in a Memorandum Opinion bearing this date;

The undersigned is of the opinion that this order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is a substantial ground for difference of opinion, and that an immediate appeal from this order as authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) may materially advance the ultimate termination of this litigation.
